SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

NEVER was there greater need of THE INDEX than there is to-day; will not its sincere friends make fresh efforts to increase its circulation?

ATTEMPTS are making at Washington to open the Capitol Botanical Gardens and the Smithsonian Institution on Sundays. Don Pedro gets mentioned in this connection—with a back glance at Philadelphia and General Hawley.

IT is not impossible, however infrequent, for Orthodox writers to do justice to the moral character of free thinkers. Rev. John S. C. Abbott says of Franklin: "Franklin discarded Jesus Christ as an authoritative teacher, and yet he made strenuous efforts to attain moral perfection. . . . Deism has never presented to the world an apostle more worthy of homage than Benjamin Franklin."

BISHOP GILBERT HAVEN, of the Methodist Church, said in a recent lecture in Boston: "Let us welcome to our shores every nation, only demanding that they shall recognize Christ and Christianity, the Bible and Testament, as our only true national liberty." That is demanding a great deal more than the Constitution demands. But the Bishop is in favor of making the Constitution demand it all.

IT WAS a good omen that the trustees of the Johns Hopkins University "carefully omitted the faintest religious observance in the opening exercises of the University"—though the Boston Journal, in an article which a correspondent suggests belongs in our "Sanctuary of Superstition," deploras the fact. The world needs now and then an example of sticking to business, without lugging in by the heels a text of Scripture or a perfunctory prayer where it has no natural place.

REV. MR. BURGESS, President of the North-Western Christian University, said in his late debate with Mr. B. F. Underwood: "I said that the Bible taught that the man who seduced another from his faith in God should be put to death. It was right that they should have the right to punish him who enticed and seduced another man away from the religion and opinions that he held dear." Behold the voice of the Church in all ages! When her tongue is so bold, what would not her hand do, if once again she had the power?

TWO EMINENT Orthodox clergymen have come out quite recently in favor of complete secularization of the public schools. One is the Rev. W. W. Patton,

D.D., of Chicago, who delivered an excellent lecture on "The Bible in Schools" at Farwell Hall on September 24. The other is the Rev. S. T. Spear, D.D., of Brooklyn, who has just republished, in book form, his able articles in the New York Independent on "Religion and the State." Both these gentlemen are broad and liberal enough to appreciate the justice of the secular principle; and we rejoice heartily in their outspoken advocacy of it.

THESE ARE the choice terms in which the Passaic City (N. J.) Herald of September 30 refers to the "Patriotic Address" of the National Liberal League: "We have been shown an infamous pamphlet calculated to mix religion with politics, and meant to influence the most ignorant class of voters who do not know that, by the new constitutional amendment and by the Constitution of our own State, money cannot be appropriated to sectarian schools. This vile pamphlet is being circulated to create hatred against Catholics. Every intelligent citizen should frown upon the circulation of such a vile and wicked pamphlet. Keep your religion out of politics." Could anything be more absurd or more dishonest?

THE Tribune relates this ludicrous anecdote: "Congressman Banning, of Cincinnati, is great in many things, but greatest of all as a handshaker. This latter accomplishment was largely instrumental in electing him to Congress, and he is trying hard to make it return him this fall. Following out his usual plan he rushed up to a prominent German merchant in Cincinnati the other day, holding out both hands, and exclaiming with much fervor: 'How are you, old friend?' The old friend failed to recognize him, and a bystander said: 'This is Mr. Banning.' 'Yes,' said the Congressman, 'Gen. Banning. I am Gen. Banning.' 'So you live about here?' 'Oh, yes. I am a neighbor of yours. I am the member of Congress from this district.' 'So? Chinneral Panning? Vell, I never hear dot name before.' The chances are he will never hear it again from its owner's lips." This is just the place to quote a pathetic bit of true poetry from the Boston Herald:

DER CANDIDATE.
"Who stands der streets and corners round,
Mit sefrel azes to be ground,
Und shmiled und bowed und nefer frowned?
Der Candidate."

"Who held your hand ven you would start,
Und told you you was mighty smart,
And how he lured you mit his hart?
Der Candidate."

THE BOLTON (England) Evening News, of September 9, thus alludes to two well-known Boston buildings: "Two of the finest buildings in Boston stand side by side, only a few feet apart. These are the Parker Memorial Hall and the Paine Memorial Hall. The former is the larger of the two, and is indeed a noble building; whilst the lesser dimensions of the latter are amply compensated for in the greater beauty of the architectural design and the richness of the ornamental carvings in stone. They are, both of them, stately fabrics, and are worthy to commemorate the virtues and services of the great and good men whose names they bear. Theodore Parker and Thomas Paine had each in their day to run the gauntlet of a public opinion which was utterly incapable of appreciating their great and sterling merits. But

"The demons of our sires become The saints that we adore."

"Theodore Parker, ostracized even by the freedom-loving Unitarians of the day, is now coming to be regarded as one of the brightest ornaments of the Christian Church. And the freethinking, but nevertheless truly religious and God-fearing, patriot, Thomas Paine, will, some day or other, be revered as he deserves. Boston has done herself lasting honor in erecting these two memorials, and thus taking the initiative in performing a tardy act of justice to two of the worthiest men of modern times."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Thoughts on Intuition.

BY WILLIAM WICKERSHAM.

There are many notions about intuition which are vague and indefinite; but intuition and inspiration are usually regarded as the same thing, or at least as closely allied to each other. Both terms commonly signify the involuntary reception of ideas into the mind in a way unlike the ordinary method of reasoning from premise to conclusion; and in a way unlike any of the ordinary mental processes treated of in mental science.

Further, it is believed that only a few of mankind are gifted with inspiration or the intuitional faculty; and these only occasionally manifest it, often when least expecting it. A new idea will flash upon the mind as though by a supernatural process, or an extraordinary mental illumination and exaltation of spirit. In these periods of illumination the mind appears to be raised above the world of material things into a purely mental world, and in a state of enthusiasm attains the highest reach of thought, truth, beauty, and excellence; and while in this state the moral appears so transcendent as to put material things into comparative insignificance. The man thus elevated in thought brings his new knowledge to his normal state, and is able to impart it to others, and it becomes the property of all mankind. The prophet, the poet, the scientist, the artist, and the inventor all claim their share of this intuitional power.

This intuition or inspiration was considered by the Jews to be the voice of God directly to the spirit of man; and as God was believed to be infinite in knowledge, his communications to man were believed to be infallible. Hence the idea of the infallibility of the Bible. Most of the sacred books of the great religions of the world have been believed infallible on the same ground.

The transcendentalists believe in intuition, and, though they may not be quite so settled in their belief that intuition is the voice of God speaking directly, as a person, to the souls of men, they believe that truth comes to the consciousness from a personal God, or from some source other than through the medium of reason. For instance, Theodore Parker was so strongly impressed, had such a vivid consciousness of the existence of God and of immortality as left no room for doubting; a belief not built upon the beauty, order, and harmony manifested in the material world, nor upon that miracle, the existence of a living human being, but upon the strong feeling, the ever-abiding impression, the conviction intuitional, that there is that within us which shall survive the body, and that there is a God, a Father, who is the framer and ruling power of the universe. Some of those who are so gifted have very strong impressions, amounting to undoubting convictions; while others are not blessed with impressions so strong; and others again, embracing a large majority of mankind, have no such intuitional impressions at all.

Now I have examined this subject with some care, and think that these intuitions are capable of purely scientific solution, and can be explained as clearly as other mental phenomena. Since there are so many who stand in the first rank as liberal scholars, who still regard intuition as authoritative, if not infallible, obeying its every prompting, and making its still, small voice the guiding star of life, it may not be uninteresting to suggest an explanation of these things. I will first state a few facts, familiar to every one, which are pertinent to the subject in hand.

It is well known that, if an object is presented to the eye for a mere instant, say one-hundredth of a second, no impression will be made; that is, none is remembered, though a perfect photograph can be taken in the same length of time on the instantaneous plan. The image is perfectly formed on the retina, and it may be, and probably is, the fact, that the impression, both on the eye and the brain, is perfect; but the memory is not equal to the retention of an impression of so short duration.

It is equally true that thoughts passing through the mind rapidly cannot be retained in the memory, while, if they pass more slowly, they may be retained. This is a fact of common experience.

The mind in contemplating a new subject proceeds slowly. For instance, in the first application of the gamut, in the reading of music, each note is to be considered in its several relations,—its position in the scale, its length, and so forth; the questions, "Is it natural? Is it flat? Is it sharp? Is it to be loud or low, soft or harsh?" and several other questions, are to be asked and answered; the peculiar tone of voice by which each note shall be made to contribute most effectively to the beauty and excellence of the whole composition of which it is a part. Now at first the mind is conscious of every one of these questions; but gradually, as the work becomes more familiar, there is less effort required, and the ability to proceed more rapidly is attained, until, with the experienced performer, all memory of volitions to seek, of seeking and of finding these relations, is lost,—all memory of adapting the vocal chords to the pitch of the note is lost. I say "lost," and yet this may mislead; I mean that these various transactions of the mind in volition, in seeking and finding these various relations, were long enough in the first instance for the memory to retain them; but finally the performance of each of these acts of the eye and of the mind is of so short duration, with the skilled performer, that no memorial record is or can be kept of them. The results of this mental labor, a knowledge of the relations of each part to the whole, may sometimes be retained; but the great amount of mental work by which these results are reached cannot be retained.

The theory of the inability of the mind to arrest and retain thoughts which pass through it rapidly, is further supported by a consideration of the judgment of distance, exercised in the act of sight. We look at an object, and its approximate distance is fixed in the mind instantaneously, as it commonly seems to us, and there is not the slightest trace in the memory of our having reasoned from premises to conclusion, or of having formed this judgment on numerous data; and I think ninety-nine out of every hundred persons would deny that any such process passed through the mind.

The first datum on which this judgment is nevertheless based, is the effort of adjustment of the eye to the focal distance, which diminishes with the increased distance of the object. In adjusting the eyepiece of a telescope, we do it slowly, sometimes making many trials before we get the sharpest outline, often moving it the wrong way, or too far in the right direction. But we acquire great skill in the use of the eye; evidently, as in the case of the telescope, in our first glance at an object, forty-nine times out of fifty the adjustment of the eye is wrong. We exercise the judgment in determining in what direction the movement must be, and then we apply the conclusion which has been reasoned to, and correct the adjustment, until we secure the clearest vision of the object. We attain it by a course of reasoning and experiments; and when it is reached the particular adjustment is an indication of the distance of the object. The mind has to go through a computation like that which the cannoner is required to make, to find the proper degree of elevation of his piece to hit a target at a given distance. Next, the adjustment of the axis of each eye to the object and a computation of the distance by the parallax of the two eyes; yet, in both of these methods, such great skill and dexterity of the eye is acquired that it appears to be done instantaneously. Another means of judging of distance is by the intermediate objects, and sometimes by objects beyond; and again we judge by the degree of distinctness or clearness with which the object appears to the eye, near objects being more distinct.

Now all these experiments of the eye, and all these computations and reasonings from the several premises, are gone through with in judging of distance, and performed with such wonderful rapidity and precision that the memory does not, and cannot, retain the slightest trace of them. Notwithstanding the great number of acts of the eye, the great number of volitions in the various experiments in its adjustments, and the great number of computations, reasonings, and conclusions in each determination of distance, it seems like a single act. Hence it is clear that a large portion of our thought and mental work serves us for an instant, and disappears forever, as a scaffolding to a building; and it is further clear that the greater the rapidity of the mental work, the larger the proportion of it which is not memorized.

I shall undertake to show presently, that this principle has much to do with intuition; but first I will give a few incidents which came under my own observation, by way of illustration of the subject, which I think greatly valuable in its solution.

I shall have to introduce here some curious and wonderful intellectual manifestations of my mother, as illustrative of intuition. In her native place, York County, Pa., the schools were very defective, and it was not the custom to teach arithmetic, grammar, and geography to girls; reading and writing was deemed sufficient, and therefore my mother's schooling was limited to reading and writing. Arithmetic she never studied in whole or in part, and I am satisfied that she never learned a single rule in the text-books. When she was about fourteen, the care of her mother's family was largely thrown upon her, which taxed her mental resources and bodily strength pretty severely. She married at the age of twenty-five. When her eldest son was about sixteen, he commenced the study of arithmetic alone, working on the farm in the daytime, and studying at night; his father did indeed give him some little instruction up to the rule of three, where his knowledge in that department of science ended. However, one evening, when my brother was very much puzzled with a difficult question in double-position, having failed to get the answer, he expressed some impatience; mother asked him what the question was, and he answered her by reading to her from the book. After a few moments thought she gave the answer. It was a matter of great surprise to him, and to me; though but a boy of ten, I could not help wondering how a person untaught in arithmetic could answer its most difficult questions.

It was not long before she was put to another test of the same kind, but she promptly responded and gave the true answer; and she did this repeatedly afterwards, until it was found that there was no question in the arithmetic which she was not able to solve, in every instance giving a prompt and correct answer. But there was one very curious feature of the case. She could not (though repeatedly asked) explain her method or process of working out these problems; yet, when she reached the conclusion, her faith was undoubting as to its correctness.

After the arithmetic, her son took up algebra (the very name was unknown to mother). Strange to say, when he reached some difficult question, she showed the same ability in its solution as in questions of the arithmetic. Though many questions were asked her, there was no instance, so far as I know, where she did not answer correctly; yet in this, as in the other cases, she could give no account of the manner of working out these algebraic problems.

At this time I left the neighborhood, and was absent for several years. When grown up, and after having studied arithmetic and algebra, I returned with the determination, if possible, to find out the secret of mother's power. First, I wished to put it to a fair test, to see if the manifestation was just what I, in my younger years, believed it to be; for I felt myself better able to judge of the whole matter than in my boyish days. To assure myself of the facts, then, was my first work. Accordingly I asked her various questions, until I was satisfied that there was no mistake as to the manifestations; she certainly had the power as above stated. Then I arranged a series of questions, graded from very simple to complicated and difficult ones. I first asked the most simple, requesting her to think slowly, and to go over it several times, until she could memorize the way she worked it out. But this was to her very difficult. She answered the first question as soon as it was asked (just as I should answer a question on the multiplication table), as if from memory; and yet I took pains to have all the questions new to her, so that the conclusion could not possibly be reached except by a fresh process of reasoning. At last she was successful in explaining her method; and then I took the next in the series, which by going over many times, she was able to memorize the process of her work. Although it was extremely difficult for her, she continued, until she was able to explain her methods of solution of the whole series of questions. Without appearing to be aware of it, she would make a rule, and then work out the solution by the rule made specially for each question; and to my surprise some of these rules were similar to those in algebra for similar questions.

When I reflect what the labor and the difficulty must be to one who has studied nothing of the rules of mathematics, in taking a complex question, considering the many questions which must be asked and answered before a rule can be made that will suit the case, and then proceeding with that rule step by step until the solution is complete (and all of this done as a purely mental operation, without a figure or symbol being made on paper or slate),—I say, considering the wonderful mental activity and power required to achieve such a feat, this phenomenon is astounding beyond measure. Of miracles it is the greatest; all material things become cheap and mean by its side; it is transcendent; it is Godlike. These manifestations, so rich and grand, inspire me with an enthusiasm and ardor for more knowledge of this wonder of wonders, the human mind. The more I pondered over this matter, the stronger the conviction became that it turned a new leaf in mental science; I felt that a key was furnished to solve the mysteries of intuition. It explains that which has been attributed to God himself, or, at any rate, that which has been considered an unfathomable secret, past finding out, by a purely scientific method; it shows intuition to be a mental process, susceptible of investigation like any other mental process or law of the human mind.

After witnessing these wonderful manifestations of mental power, and reflecting upon the wide diversity of character in this respect, it occurs to me, that any discussion which will throw light on its origin will be interesting. On looking into such matters, we shall find that many causes, instead of one, are required to give us that rich completeness of character which now and then surprises us, and glows with such a rich radiance as to give light to the whole world.

I have stood upon the beach and watched the incoming waves for hours together, to see if I could discover any order in them. Commonly the first thing noticeable would be their inequality, and the difference of their extent up the incline of the beach. Then I have sought a position where an island, or a line of coast, deflected the waves in such manner as to make the deflected waves pass over the same surface of water as the direct waves; this made a peculiar and interesting complication. Sometimes there would be a smooth surface between two waves having the average level of the sea, which was owing to the fact that one of the deflected waves came between two of the direct waves, and, being of the same size, just filled the hollow. Then again I would occasionally see a wave twice the ordinary size, which was caused by a deflected wave occupying the same space on the surface of the water with the direct wave. Then by watching a long time I would see the union of two waves of an extraordinary size, making one from four to six times the volume of an ordinary wave. Many a person, spending an idle hour on the beach, has been surprised by finding his feet drenched in water, while thinking himself at a safe distance from its approach; being entirely unaware of the singular combination which produced the unexpected result.

Now, however irrelevant these observations may at first seem, there is something in them almost exactly analogous to the varied intercrossings of character in the actual history of human life, rendering them important in this connection. When the father has a character very marked and prominent, and the mother has the same character depressed, the prominent character of the father disappears in the child; this is the deflected wave coming between the direct waves. When the father and mother have the same prominent character, you may expect the child to have an extraordinary prominence of the same character. Again, if the fond grandparents should have the same character prominent, and the parents should have inherited and cultivated it, it would appear in the child multiplied by four, together with the increase due to cultivation; this would be the union of four waves, constantly augmented by the wind. It matters not from how great a distance the waves may have come; if they come from the four quarters of the earth, the effect is the same; if they unite, they augment; and, if they intervene, they depress. It matters not from how remote a period character may have descended, the resultant inherited character of the child is made up of the thousand united waves of character which augment, minus the thousand waves which intervene and depress, the character of the thousand ancestors. No doubt, these intervening and augmenting characters tend, on the average, to equalize each other; yet in any one child the augmenting characters of a thousand generations may out-influence the depressing characters to a surprising degree.

To return to my mother: she was from a long line of accountants and wealthy ancestors. She belonged to the Jennings family, who had for many generations accumulated wealth by the manufacture of iron in Birmingham, England, by other kindred pursuits; and thus she had inherited great imaginative power, and also a power of rapid and accurate computation which had been accumulating for many generations. Added to this, her inherited imagination and mathematical power were brought to their highest tension and activity early in life, by her habituating herself to work out her own problems, by means of which she acquired the power of rapid mental computation. Thus gradually one after another of her mental operations became so familiar, and so quickened by practice, that the process was not remembered; and her memory by force of long habit had acquired the power of retaining only the premises and the conclusion. But the rule by which she worked out these problems (for she always made a rule), together with the process or reasoning, were forgotten and habitually laid aside; like the scaffolding to a building as soon as the work was done. Induction and deduction were alike needful to such work; such a performance would be impossible without an intensely active imagination. But this case does not stand alone, as there are, and have been, other natural mathematicians.

From the foregoing facts it is clearly evident that a very large portion of our mental work is forgotten in a very short time after it is performed; while the conclusion, the result of this work, is retained. Although the reasoning or demonstration passes through the mind in an instant, and then disappears, it often leaves an impression of its character. If, for instance, the demonstration is very clear and conclusive, a very strong impression of the truth of the conclusion will accompany it. If the reasoning is in some way associated with pleasant memories, or with pleasant thoughts or reflections, the conclusion will carry a pleasant impression along with it; and if there are in some way very sad thoughts associated with the reasoning, neither the reasoning nor the sad thoughts will be retained, but the conclusion will be enveloped in a dark shadow. Evil presentiments, or impressions which are thought to be the forerunners of pending misfortune, sometimes originate in this way.

Before proceeding farther, I shall here state an argument drawn from the above class of facts, and others of a similar character, by intuitionists, just the reverse of what it seems to me the facts teach. Rev. Samuel Longfellow, some two years since, read two or three sermons and essays, in which he urged, in a beautiful style and with a plausible ingenuity, that those intuitional ideas and truths which come into the mind apparently without any effort, and without any memory of their origin by a process of reasoning, were above and beyond reason, and stood on an authority of their own,—above the province of reason to criticize. He did not say exactly that these intuitions were infallible; but the essays of which I speak had a strong leaning, as it seemed to me, in that direction. But, from my point of view, the idea that the water in a cloud becomes annihilated when it passes into a perfect state of vapor, and becomes invisible, is as philosophical as to suppose that the reasoning by which a conclusion is arrived at has no existence because it is not retained in the memory.

In further illustration of this part of my subject, I will state a very curious experience of my own. I had been trying for many days to reach a certain invention, which was very difficult, but of great importance. I was one morning in Kenyon's Hotel, Cheapside, London, waiting for my breakfast; and, after dwelling for a while on my invention, all at once, like a flash of light, I felt that I had discovered the thing which I had been so earnestly seeking; but where was it? It was gone; that is, the process by which I had reached the conclusion, or thing sought, was gone, and the conclusion also had passed out of my memory, having flashed through the mind so quickly that it could not be retained. Yet so strong an impression was left that I had solved the problem as to leave no room for doubting; and by dwelling on it awhile longer, the conclusion first, and afterwards the reasoning by which I came to it, came again into my mind.

Now the first solution of my problem—which passed out of my mind as soon as it was reached, leaving only the impression that I had found the thing sought—would, I suppose, be called a presentiment; and indeed many curious and wonderful presentiments have the same origin. The truths, and their demonstration, both pass out of the mind, leaving only their impression, more or less definite, according to the degrees of clearness of the demonstration. I have had many instances of this kind of experience, and in some cases I have never been able to recall the conclusion which I know must have been in my mind; but in every instance of such experience I have satisfied myself on the best of grounds, I think, that they were resultant conclusions from a course of reasoning.

There came a thought from upper air;
It went away I know not where.
It brought a light from all creation,
It was my grandest inspiration,
As pure it was as the limpid stream,
As sweet as is the loveliest dream;
Its light doth blend with all my powers,
Like blending breath of many flowers;
To think the thought no mortals dare,
Which passed away I know not where!

I've tried with ardor, but in vain,
To bring my truant thought again;
Though it obeys its truant will,
Its soul and beauty tarry still.
Oh for a prophet's gift, to say
What was my thought that's passed away?
This wand, with mystic power, commanded;
Its touch my very soul expanded.
Chaste and pure it was, I know,
It left my every feeling so.
Grand it was in contemplation;
It filled my soul with inspiration.
It had beauty, for, as it flies,
All things have beauty in my eyes,
Simply sweet as the chaste hare-bell.
I have not words wherewith to tell
How lovely, and how richly fair,
The thought that's gone, I know not where!
On some enchanted lucky day,
When my lost thought is far away,
A missioned phantom shall be sent
On the same path the truant went,
As arrows, shot the same way, fly
To find the lost ones where they lie.
Perhaps this mystic search so rare
May find, and bind in upper air,
And bring, so I may then declare
The thought that's gone, I know not where!

This is no fancy but has been realized a thousand times.

Professor Faraday was highly intuitional, and in his scientific investigations, after applying himself to a difficult question, the true account of it would flash upon his mind. He was obliged to note it down immediately, lest it should leave him forever; illustrating further the difficulty of retaining thoughts when they pass through the mind rapidly.

R. W. Emerson is one of the most intuitional men living. When he first began to diverge from the Unitarians, he was asked to give a reason for some of his radical opinions. He stated in substance something like this: that whatever statements he made were so made because they seemed to him to be the truth, but that he was the poorest man in the world to give a reason for any opinion which he might have. Now I take it that Mr. Emerson is one of the most gifted of men. He has a most wonderful imagination, and a great mental power for reasoning on moral subjects. Contemplating and reasoning about almost every subject presented to him became a fixed habit early in life, so that the process of reasoning so rapidly passed through his mind as to render it impossible for the memory to retain anything but the conclusions and the impression of their truthfulness; which impression came from the demonstration which preceded the remembered conclusion, though it might be, and commonly was, associated with it in the memory. Neither Mr. Emerson nor any of the transcendentalists, so far as I can learn, are aware of the origin of that consciousness of the truth of their intuitions. They do not appear to understand that this consciousness of truthfulness and the intuitional conclusion itself are both the results of a mental demonstration which preceded them, and which has left the memory. I think any one of them might, by a sufficiently careful inspection of their thoughts, patiently continued, discover the origin of each intuition and its associated impression; and I think that each transcendentalist who will take this pains and make this discovery will no longer place intuition in higher authority than reason, but will regard them as merely two modes of reasoning.

Viewing this matter in the light of utility, it is a great economy of mental work that the memory shall be able to lay all of it aside as soon as it has performed its proper service, and retain only that which is useful to retain,—the conclusion, and any useful impression which the peculiarities of the demonstration may have associated with it. This power of forgetting the mental work and remembering only the result is of great value; for, if we had not that power, our minds would soon become great store-houses of chaff, with here and there a kernel, so few and far between that they could never be found in time for use.

Another thing, I think, worthy of consideration as an element of intuition, is inherited instinct, or something very much like it.

Once, when a boy, I found a wild turkey's nest; I brought the eggs home, and had them hatched by a hen; though the hen and all our fowls were very tame, these young turkeys were extremely wild, and appeared terrified at the approach of any human being, running as though for dear life; while they appeared to have no fear of the cows, horses, sheep, etc., in the same yard. This instinctive fear and dread of man evidently had its origin in the fact of their being hunted down by man; and those which escaped him were often terrified by his approach for that purpose. This continued for many generations. An instinct gradually of dread and fear of their common enemy grew up, which was transmitted by each generation to its offspring. Now I think it highly probable that the almost universal tendency of children to be afraid in the dark, is to be accounted for in the same way. During the hundreds of generations of our ancestors in barbarous life, when a continual warfare existed, the various kidnappings and massacres were done under the cover of darkness; and during all these countless generations a fear and dread of the dark existed on account of real danger, and an instinct grew and was transmitted to the offspring as a result of such real danger. The dread continued after the danger ceased, the origin of this fear in the dark being precisely on the same principle as that above described in the young turkeys.

Now let us carry this principle a little farther, and see how it will apply to the origin of conscience. When the first individuals of our race began to extend themselves over the land, then largely covered with forest trees and shrubs and plants, some of which produced berries and fruits on which they could subsist, they surely had no conscientious scruples against taking this fruit and subsisting upon it, wherever they could find it. It is very natural to suppose that the most vigorous and fruitful families would soon grow into tribes, and each increasing tribe would, sooner or later, find its limitation in the scarcity of food. The first tribe which found that it could subsist on oysters, would find no restraining moral sense in destroying and subsisting upon the oysters. When the pressure for food became greater, they might subsist on fish, and then on sheep, goats, antelopes, kangaroos, and cattle. Up to this time they would have incurred no risk or danger, and they would have felt no monitions of conscience against destroying the lives of these animals, and subsisting thereon; but by a further increase of their numbers famine would be inevitable, and the tribes under the greater pressure of necessity would naturally begin to subsist upon each other. No doubt many of the smaller tribes and families would be captured and eaten without much resistance; but when these were eaten by the larger tribes, and the larger and nearly equal tribes began to prey upon each other, it would not only be natural that the individuals of one tribe should object to being eaten by another, but that the more intelligent of each tribe should see that non-resistance meant extermination. Hence, out of the very necessity of existence, would grow a system of retaliation or law of revenge. Up to this time there would be no more conscientious scruple against killing and eating a man of another tribe than against killing and subsisting upon kangaroos. But now, since the law of revenge is established, and each individual finds that by taking the life of his fellow-man he incurs the risk of his own destruction, the dread of this speedy retribution soon becomes associated in the mind of every one with the act of slaying. This fear is the first element of conscience. After two neighboring tribes had existed for many generations, and the law of revenge had become more exacting and certain in its operations, there would grow up, dimly at first and more distinctly afterwards, a sense of right and obligation in the matter of life. This right of a human being to his life, as a thing to be respected by all, would at first dimly appear. That is, it would first appear, to the most gifted and imaginative, as an intuition or aspiration, and afterwards a few disciples would recognize it by a slower process; and when this right to life, and the obligation to respect it became settled in the mind and associated with the dread of retribution which the law of revenge created, then conscience was complete; yet it must not be supposed that this dread of retribution is always associated with real wrong-doing, but that which is supposed by the individual to be the wrong, and the retribution following its commission; for in a people of a low grade of intelligence a conscience may be manufactured to order, exactly suiting the policy and interest of those who create it. We have many examples of a priesthood creating a conscience for whole nations, in which the things to be observed had no relation to right, and a terrible apprehension of evil as a retribution having no foundation, in fact. The superstitions taught by the priesthood have created for whole peoples a conscientious terrorism based on mere imagination, yet capable of inheritance as much as enlightened conscientiousness based on right and reason.

Now, when our race first began to inhabit the earth, I do not think it possible for the right to life to have been respected, until the law of revenge had forced men to dread the commission of man-slaying as a danger. Suppose an island inhabited only by kangaroos, and suppose that a colony of men should be established there. The men, without any conscientious scruples, would slay and subsist upon the kangaroos; but suppose the kangaroos should object, and should insist that, for every kangaroo that was slain and eaten by man, a man should be slain and eaten by a kangaroo, and should find means to enforce this law and execute it with promptness; a conscience would soon grow up in the human colony as imperative as now exists against the slaying of man.

When this right to life in human communities, and a sense of obligation to observe and respect it, became generally recognized, and communities constantly enforced it by their laws, it would be transmitted as an instinct, a humane instinct, and would also be recognized as an inherited moral sense. Now the highest order of intuition would appear when the instinctive impulse of the moral sense impels assent to a truth, while reason by a very rapid process reaches the same truth, each confirming the other. A joy, a feeling of triumph, a degree of enthusiasm, a faith in its truthfulness, commonly accompany such an intuition. I have just explained somewhat the origin and instinctive character of the moral sense in the case of taking life; and I believe that a moral sense may be thus created regarding any kind of moral conduct, forbidding that from which our ancestors have suffered great pain, and prompting us to that conduct which brought the highest happiness to our ancestors. But the association of this emotional moral sense with that which we believe to be right or wrong is the result of reason or the effect of education.

As civilization advances, the motives which prompt men to their varied activities multiply, giving the moral sense a wider range in the varied and extended relations of life; and each new relation in an advancing society gives an additional opportunity to create and transmit a new kind of mental or moral wealth. For instance, one family (and many such there are) may create and transmit through a long line a strong sense of honor, so that it may be said of the individuals of such family that their word is as good as their bond. As to mental power, the mathematical manifestations cited above, and the imaginative power which performs such an important part in our intuitions, and indeed every kind of mental, moral, and emotional power and taste may be created and transmitted as mental wealth, and might properly be called incorporeal hereditament. When we come to know more about this kind of inheritance, and understand better the laws by which it is created and transmitted, the heirship of money will be as nothing compared with it. How this mental wealth is created; under what favoring circumstances it grows best, and how it is most successfully transmitted; from what ancestor, remote or near, we have received this or that mental or moral quality,—will become questions of the deepest interest.

It would be a matter of the highest achievement of science if we could trace back to its source that wonderful, imaginative power of Kepler, by which he was able to suggest the five laws of the solar system, and that extraordinary mathematical ability by which he was able to prove each one of these suggestions to be a fact in Nature. It would be a joy to the scientist to know from whence came, and under what favoring circumstances, that mental power of Newton, by which he was able, after pondering long and ardently over the spherical form of the bubble and dew-drop, to infer therefrom universal gravity, by finding that, if each atom attracted all the others, each could find its nearest approach to the rest only in the globular form; and also the mathematical power by which he reached up to the moon, and, by treating it as a constantly falling body, proved gravity to all mankind. The intellectual power which made these achievements possible, like every other kind of wealth, had to be earned by somebody before it could be inherited by his descendants. The questions how to create material wealth and how to use it with the greatest economy and benefit to its possessor, are considered important; should not the questions how to create this mental wealth, this intellectual and moral power?

It is the source of all progress in civilization in its most comprehensive sense, including every science and art and culture of every kind. It is interesting sometimes to look broadly over the world, and observe how few, how very few of all mankind, do anything to advance civilization, or increase the stock of human knowledge. As to the great majorities, the rank and file, their lot in life has been a very hard one, especially in the most populous parts of the earth; and it may be said to have been the rule that they who have physically labored most have enjoyed the fewest pleasures. But for those who have hitherto struggled so hard for the poorest subsistence, and have been poor, so far as mental wealth is concerned, popular education gives a bright promise in the future. But the very few make the world move onwards and upwards, and these few are the intuitive minds. These are they in whom have met the high waves of ancestral character, who have been faithful and true, and by their noble work have given back to the world their birth-wealth with usury. They are indeed "Nature's noblemen and women"; they are the prophets whom the priests have always endeavored to slay. Sad, indeed, is the fact, that the priests have so often accomplished their purpose; for no man can estimate the loss to mankind by the slaying of one of these.

No intuitive book can be reckoned infallible; yet there is one thing infallible,—the sum of intuitive power. The aggregate of mental force put forth by the faithful and true of the most intuitive and gifted shall infallibly save the world in spite of the Church and the "rings" which prey upon the souls and substance of the people. That is, the Galileos, Copernicuses, Keplers, Newtons, Franklins, Faradays, Tyndalls, Parkers, and Emersons, shall be the saviors of the world; they are constantly raising our race above that which is grovelling and mean; they are forever pointing out the higher aim and purpose; they are all the while proclaiming to us, and demonstrating to us, that we may make our lives sublime. Those who accept the better thought which these intuitions and inspirations of the gifted kindly press and urge upon all, those who accept the better thought and work it into better and nobler lives, shall be the fittest to inherit the earth; and the survival of the fittest shall constantly tend to the perfection of the race, and shall finally lead to a degree of perfection beyond anything which we are now able to conceive. The perfect law of our being shall be maintained, and righteousness shall cover the earth.

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

BY JOHN W. CHADWICK.

The republication in America of another book by Miss Cobbe (Hopes of the Human Race, James Miller, publisher, New York) is certainly a good excuse, if not an excellent reason, for a brief review of her life in general and her literary career. To many of the readers of the Register such a review will be superfluous. They know more about Miss Cobbe already than we can tell within the necessary limits of this article. But it is surely not presumptuous to conceive that others may not be so well informed.

Miss Cobbe was born in Dublin in the fall of 1822, but she is not of Celtic origin, despite the Celtic warmth of her Intuitive Morals, and many other things that she has written. Her great-grandfather, Charles Cobbe, was Archbishop of Dublin, and the first representative of the family in Ireland. An earlier ancestor was one of the judges of Charles I. But her mother was immediately English. Frances was the youngest of five children, and the only girl. Her early education was of the sort called fashionable, and was pretty nearly worthless. Her real education did not begin till she took it into her own hands. All her people belonged to the Church of England, and were steadily religious people, after the fashion of that church. A temper naturally religious in the child was fostered by the solitude compelled by the invalidism of her mother. Very early she became a thinker, and a doubter of some things contained in the New Testament, as well as elsewhere.

The common opinion that Miss Cobbe is merely a follower of Theodore Parker, albeit one of the most intelligent and ardent, is without any foundation. She is not his follower, but a contemporary growth. Her theistic views were clearly shaped before she knew anything of him, before he clearly knew of them himself. Four years of alternate scepticism and violent returns to Christianity had left her terribly exhausted by the struggle, when, one day in spring, as she was dreaming over her favorite Shelley, she found herself saying inwardly, that, though she knew nothing of God or heaven, or any law beyond that of her own soul, she would be true to that,—she would deserve her own esteem; and this resolution brought almost immediately, by its own power, as it were, a fresh kind of faith in God,—a sense that, somehow, such an effort must be pleasing to the Power that had evolved in her that inner law. Here was substantial theism, and she recognized it as such; but, craving spiritual sympathy, she read widely in the eighteenth century deists, and found them little to her mind; came at length upon the life of Blanco White, which proved much more congenial, and finally fell in with Parker through a critique of his Discourse in the Athenæum. She sent for the Discourse, and read it; with what delight, some of us can imagine who remember how it made all things new for us. It is not too much to say that from that time to this she has been the best exponent and representative of Theodore Parker's system of religious thought in England or America. Many who were with him once have fallen away; some not unwillingly, imagining that they find better things in a less transcendental system; but others with exceeding sorrow and regret. She has stood by him proudly, joyfully; feeling that every subsequent development of thought has only made the need of his transcendental ground of faith the more imperative. Her personal acquaintance with Parker, which in due time ripened into the closest friendship and the most loyal devotion to his memory and fame, began after her mother's death, when she wrote to him, desiring to be informed as to the grounds of his belief in immortality. His answer was his "Sermon of the Immortal Life," which was the bread of life to her, as it has been to thousands.

The ten years after her mother's death were years of solitary work. How wide and deep her reading must have been during these years her books bear witness, especially the richly-laden notes that crowd the foot of almost every page. In these years Intuitive Morals and Religious Duty were both written, though not at once published. Meanwhile, her definite rupture with the Established Church had taken place. Her plea, since made, for those who have less courage than she had herself, shows that she did not fail to feel the immense social and æsthetic charm of the time-honored institution from whose breast she tore herself away.

Upon her father's death, she went to Italy, and afterward reported her impressions in a charming volume called Italics. Returning, she was, for a year, a coadjutor of Mary Carpenter in the Red-House Lodge reformatory for young outcast girls, in Bristol. The best outcome of this experience was a pamphlet upon Friendless Girls, on the spur of which several new lodges were started. The spring of 1860 found Miss Cobbe again in Italy, just in time to take a long and last farewell of Theodore Parker. The former absence from England had resulted, not only in the Italics, but also in a delightful volume called Cities of the Past, which cities are Baalbec, Cairo, Rome, Jericho, Athens, and Jerusalem. Fancy her trusting herself among the ruins of Baalbec with a single native guide, and in the bowels of the great pyramid of Cheops with an Arab clamoring for backsheesh! The most consecutive piece of work that she has accomplished of late years is her Broken Lights, an excellent review of the state of different religious parties in England at the time when it was written. But, in the meantime, she has been a diligent contributor to various magazines, and many of her ablest and most interesting articles have, from time to time, been gathered up into such volumes as Hours of Work and Play, Studies Ethical and Social, Darwinism and Morality, and the volume now before us, Hopes of the Human Race. The preface of this volume (having special reference to Mr. Mill's Essay on Religion), and the sermon "Doomed to be Saved," are new material; the two essays on "The Life after Death" were printed in the Theological Review (and have been generously quoted in the Register), as also was the highly-interesting and deeply-thoughtful paper on "The Evolution of the Social Sentiment."

The review of Mill is very careful, and does not fail to expose in some particulars the weakness of his argument. Well may she resent his argument for the utility of religion, when to her the utility of breathing or eating would seem as idle to discuss, so essential does religion seem to her to the spiritual life of man. The essays upon immortality are marked by all the ardor and enthusiasm with which she always addresses herself to this theme. Their value lies far less in any argument which they contain for immortality than in their kindly, sensible discussion of the manner of the immortal life, once granting that the fact is well assured. The book, as a whole, leaves an impression that, though earnestly disposed to do full justice to the results and tendencies of modern science, she fails to penetrate to its essential poetry and piety. For myself, I must confess that Mr. Abbot's paper upon Darwinism and morality leaves upon my mind a sense of the eternal sanctions of morality not a whit inferior to that which breathes through every page of Miss Cobbe's "Intuitive Morals." Morality does not lose, but gain, when its distinctions are seen to be absolute; not in the sense of having no raison d'être whatsoever, but in the sense of being inevitable to the social life of man. Where two or three are gathered together, there is the Holy Spirit—Duty—in the midst of them.

The book by which Miss Cobbe is still best known, and for which she will be longest remembered and most fondly blessed, is her Intuitive Morals. And yet it is not for the most obvious characteristics of the work that we now value it most highly. It might be far less strong than it is in its opposition to sensational psychology, and all utilitarian theories of morals and our total impression of the book would not be very different from what it now is. The book is a rhapsody of unselfishness. Do good, hoping for nothing again,—this is its everlasting and heart-stirring cry; a cry so fresh, so strong, so eloquent, that it must pierce the most inveterately selfish heart with new compunctions, and awaken new resolves.

Miss Cobbe does well to insist beforehand that the value of her work does not depend upon the correctness of her metaphysics. But sometimes she seems to forget this, and to speak as if the welfare of the race were staked on certain theories which failing of acceptance, the reign of conscience would be over. For ourselves, we believe that every thinker, thinking honestly, will add something to the truth, however hostile to our views of truth his theories may be at any given time. Let Bain and Spencer say their strongest word; if they are seeking for the truth—and who can doubt it?—they will not be blind leaders of the blind. Let their unwearied analysis go on; and in whatever direction it carries them, it ought not to be doubted that a grander synthesis will be the ultimate result. So, here already is Prof. Sidgwick with a great book, for those who are not afraid of close writing and hard thinking, going to prove that, in the last analysis, utilitarianism makes the intuitive confession, and intuitionism makes the utilitarian. Meantime, every earnest moralist will pretty surely be in practical accord with every other. In given circumstances, a Frances Power Cobbe and a John Stuart Mill would act with singular unanimity, although their theories of morals seem to be so far apart.

But thanks, a hundred times thanks, for all the good work that Miss Cobbe has done. There is a well-spring of goodness, humanity and happiness forever bubbling from her heart, up through her mind, and overflowing in continual benedictions. Her earnestness, her geniality and her enthusiasm are contagious. One should not read her much who is not willing to be made more a lover of his kind, more a worshipper of God.—Christian Register, Aug. 5, 1876.

GOV. TILDEN AND SECTARIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

HIS OPPOSITION TO THE ATTEMPT TO SAVE OUR PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM.—A WARNING TO THE FRIENDS OF FREE SCHOOLS THROUGHOUT THE UNION.

The attempt of the Democratic party, under the lead of Tweed in the Senate and Tilden as chairman of the Democratic State Committee, to break up our public schools by establishing a system of parochial schools under the management of the Romish priesthood, and the support of these schools from the public treasury, had, by Jan. 1, 1870, under various statutes, obtained such headway that more than half a million dollars a year was taken out of the Treasury of the City of New York alone and paid over to convents, parochial schools, and other sectarian institutions. One of these laws, known as the tenth section of the tax levy, imposed for that purpose an annual tax of some $250,000 upon the City of New York, and appropriated the money exclusively for the support of parochial and other schools that were opponents of the free common schools. Petitions for the repeal of this tenth section from every town in the State, and having over one hundred thousand signatures, were sent to the Legislature in the spring of 1869. Under the pressure of this movement said tenth section was repealed, but the repeal was not to take effect until after the money for 1869 had been distributed to the parochial schools.

Soon after the Legislature met in the winter of 1870, various bills were introduced under theegis of Tweed to reestablish the appropriations to parochial schools and sectarian institutions, and also to subvert the Board of Education of the City of New York, and make it a mere political machine, and also by means of his so-called two per cent. tax levy scheme to enable the Ring to raise unlimited millions in the City of New York through taxation and sale of bonds for Ring plunder. The last of March, 1871, it became clearly evident that these measures would pass unless a tremendous and non-partisan movement was made in the City of New York to stop it. As the Legislature in both branches and the Governor were Democratic, it was absolutely essential to success that the movement in New York City against these Ring measures should be made by leading Democrats as well as leading Republicans. A public meeting at the Cooper Institute, on the evening of April 6, 1871, was decided upon, and the committee having the matter in charge were instructed to invite Mr. Tilden, the chairman of the Democratic State Committee, to preside at the meeting. He was called upon at his office, No. 12 Wall Street; the above Ring measures and their progress at Albany were explained to him; the object of the public meeting, and the necessity of having it presided over by a leading Democrat in order to insure any success against the Ring in a Democratic Legislature were stated. The attempt to destroy the public schools through building up parochial schools with public money was especially dwelt upon, as well as the great importance to the success of the movement of Mr. Tilden's presiding. He listened attentively to the statement, and answered by saying very politely, but decidedly, that he could not preside at the meeting, or take any part in the movement. He was then asked if he would allow his name to be used as one of the vice-presidents of the meeting, but he declined to allow his name to be used in any way in connection with it.

The late William F. Havemeyer was then called upon by the committee, who found him in the office of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, of which he was president, and the objects of the meeting, and the necessity for a Democratic presiding officer were explained to him in terms similar to those used to Mr. Tilden. Mr. Havemeyer wanted to know why the committee called upon him. He was told because he was a life-long Democrat, and well known to the people of the City and State. He replied that the proper man to preside at that meeting was Mr. Tilden. The committee then informed him that they had called upon Mr. Tilden, and he had refused to have anything whatever to do with the movement. At this remark, Mr. Havemeyer threw up his head with a "humph," and said, "He does, does he?" "Yes," the committee remarked, "and even refused to allow the use of his name as one of the vice-presidents." Mr. Havemeyer then said: "I am opposed to sectarian appropriations of public money. I am in favor of the common schools, and I am opposed to the whole schedule of Ring legislation at Albany, and I have no objection to going before the public and saying so. I don't want any office, and I am not afraid of injuring my prospects." The Cooper Institute was crowded to overflowing on that evening. Mr. Havemeyer presided. There was a long list of vice-presidents and secretaries, and the whole proceedings with the resolutions and speeches appeared in the Times of April 7, 1871. In view of this positive refusal of Mr. Tilden in April, 1871, to take any step to oppose the Tammany Ring and their infamous measures to subvert our public schools, and carry out their schemes to plunder the Treasury of the City of New York, it was a little cool in him afterward to state on Jan. 20, 1873, in a public letter published by himself, that "it is wholly untrue that at any moment I was timid or selfishly reserved, or shrank from any responsibility." It is entirely clear that in April, as in September, 1871, he was thoroughly timid,—though chairman of the Democratic State Committee, and was selfishly reserved; that is, he did not dare come out and express himself publicly against the measures of the Ring, especially against their attempt to subvert the public school system, and he did shrink from any responsibility, even so slight as one as presiding at a public meeting, or allowing his name to be used as a vice-president.—New York Times, Sept. 23.

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES

ADOPTED AT THE NATIONAL REFORM CONVENTION, PITTSBURGH, FEB. 3, 1874.

The friends of National Reform, in general convention assembled, do hereby make the following declaration of their position, principles, and objects, and cordially invite the cooperation of all who accept in whole or in part the views herein set forth:—

1st. This country was settled and its institutions founded by those who believe in God and accept his word as the law of their lives; and this their religious faith was not an external feature, ingrafted on their political existence, but an original, fundamental, and essential element of it, manifesting itself in their criminal code as well as in their recognition of God's sovereignty and their subjection in the colonial charters, the Declaration of Independence, the early State Constitutions, and official acts and documents. These Christian features of our American civilization and national life were indispensable forces for the restraint of vice, the development of virtue, and the unification of the people; and we desire to maintain and perpetuate the same, believing that every effort for their obliteration tends directly towards social disorganization.

2d. Whether recognized or not, the eternal truth remains, that Jesus Christ is the Ruler of the nations of the earth, and will hold them, as nations, accountable for their doings; and remembering how, in various forms, reverence for God has marked the civil life of this nation, we most profoundly regret that the Constitution of the United States, which is our fundamental law, contains no explicit recognition of God's sovereignty, or of his law as the standard of morality; and we declare our purpose by every legitimate means to seek its amendment in this regard, and now inscribe on our banner, God's moral law the nation's guide.

3d. Such an amendment is of high importance in view of the overshadowing influence of a written Constitution in moulding the morals and laws of a people. All experience shows that the two cannot remain permanently separated. If we, as a nation, do not, therefore, bring up the Constitution in this respect to the level of the moral sentiment of the people, it will surely bring the people down to its condition of ignoring and disregarding God.

4th. In seeking this amendment we are laboring for the most practical results; namely, the perpetuation of the Sabbath; the proper regard for an oath; the integrity and purity of the marriage relation; the retention of the Bible in the schools; the suppression of intemperance; the enforcement of law; and the maintenance of all the other Christian features of our civilization, without the humanizing and enlightening influences of which man's progress must cease, and the continuance of free government become impossible.

5th. The adoption of such an amendment to the Constitution would bring no more union of the Church and State in the future than there has been in the past; but as, by amendment number one, we are effectually guarded from all danger of such union, we seek by this to guard against the equal peril of the practical adoption, by the State, of atheism, by which virtue shall be fettered and vice turned loose; and further, we declare our readiness to accept either a modification of the preamble or an additional amendment, in any form of words that shall secure effectually the end sought for; but rejoicing in the success of the past, and pressed by the demands of the present in the spreading of political corruption, we hereby pledge ourselves to each other, to the nation, and to God, to labor on with unflinching patience and determined perseverance, until it is written in the fundamental law of the nation that the Bible is its standard of morality and Jehovah its God.

LIBERAL RESOLUTIONS.

The Spiritualists of Iowa, in a late Convention, adopted the following resolutions as a part of their declaration of principles. They afford another proof that Spiritualists are liberal and progressive:—

"Resolved, That the most extended liberty compatible with the inalienable rights of each and all mankind under constitutional and statutory law is the greatest safeguard of freedom and good society.

"Resolved, That advocating (as we do) that 'no State shall make a law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,' we ask the passage by Congress, and the adoption by the States, of 'the Blaine amendment' as amended by the Senate, except the last sentence of the first section of the said proposed sixteenth amendment, to which we except, and ask that it be stricken out before the amendment shall have been put upon its final passage.

"Resolved, That churches and other ecclesiastical property should no longer be exempt from just taxation.

"Resolved, That the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State legislatures, in the army and navy, and all other institutions supported by public money, should be discontinued.

"Resolved, That all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character should cease.

"Resolved, That all religious services now supported by the government should be abolished; and especially that the use of any and all Bibles, of whatever name, translation, or religion, Protestant, Catholic, Mohammedan, Pagan, or what not, in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or books, or avowedly as a book or books of religious worship, should be prohibited.

"Resolved, That not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several States, but in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage should be conceded to any special religion, and that our entire political system should be founded and administered on a purely secular basis."—Boston Investigator.

A NEW CURE FOR DRUNKENNESS.—The Pall Mall Gazette says: A wholesome lesson was given to a drunken husband at Preston, on Wednesday, by a justly indignant wife. A man named Trayner, the keeper of a lodging-house, arrived at his home on the afternoon of that day, drunk. After a "scrimmage" with his wife, he settled himself comfortably on the floor and fell asleep. Mr. Trayner's weakness was Mrs. Trayner's opportunity. Depositing her unconscious husband on the sofa, she placed a night-cap on his head, covered his face with flour and his body with a shroud, which she borrowed from a neighboring shop. Having decorated the shroud with flowers, she placed two lighted candles on a table in front of the sofa, and, seating herself on the door-step of the house, aroused the neighborhood by a melancholy "wail" for the dead. The house was soon filled with sympathizing friends and acquaintances, including a police-constable, who came to have a look at the corpse. Loud were the lamentations, when the deceased man suddenly lifted himself up, and, with a stare that curdled the blood and made the flesh of all present creep, ejaculated, "What the devil's up now?" The grief of the beholders was speedily turned into joy when they found that drunkenness, and not death, had been the cause of Mr. Trayner's insensibility. The position of that gentleman, however, must, for the moment, have been painful in the extreme. Embarrassing explanations ensued, and the affair ended in "a general spree."

FELICIEN DAVID is described as an amiable, devout, unworldly sort of a man, fond of his quiet life, his intimate friends, his rose garden, and his visions of benevolent piety. Those who knew him speak of him, in his old age, as a "white-haired child,"—that is to say, a child of light. His music, they say, was but a hymn of gratitude for the sunshine which caused his flowers to blossom; he cared nothing for worldly fame. It seems very wrong that there should have been a squabble of official pedantry, or clerical bigotry, over the grave of this gentle enthusiast for all goodness; but Orthodoxy and spirituality do not always walk hand in hand.—Illustrated London News, Sept. 16.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 12, 1876.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 36 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, WILLIAM J. POTTER,
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, Editorial Contributors.

REMOVAL.

On and after October 1, 1876, the publication office of THE INDEX will be No. 231 Washington Street, Boston. Office hours will be from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M.

WHAT AN argument! "The people have no right to be instructed in any religion save the Catholic, until they are of age"! So a house on fire has no right to be extinguished, until the cellar, basement, and first floor are thoroughly burnt up. Are Spaniards all idiots, that the Catholic clergy should address to them such reasons for suppressing Protestant schools?

REV. MR. COPELAND, of Lincoln, Nebraska, paints this truthful picture in his Radical Leaves: "Wherever any sect has the power, it prohibits free speech, refusing to radicals the use of public buildings, such as school and court houses, and exerts a powerful influence in politics, causing the election of officers and legislators known to favor its views, and demanding of candidates for office that they be Christians after its type of Christianity. Already there exists some union of Church and State, which an increasing number is seeking to make more close. Unless radicals unite now in defence of religious freedom, the day is not far distant when the Christian Church, sinking non-essentials, will unite to persecute free thinkers, and the terrible scenes of past centuries will be reenacted. Human nature is the same as years ago; Orthodoxy as bitter and hostile to heresy. The article quoted from the Shepherd of the Valley declares the Roman Church only lacks the power, else would it persecute as of old; and what is true of the Roman Church is true of the evangelical churches. Friends, be on your guard, and resist all encroachments of sectarianism."

THIS LETTER was received recently from a Wisconsin correspondent: "I am intensely interested in the Liberal League movement, and desire to find my way into active service in it. Something more than a year ago I came to this place out of the Western Unitarian ministry, quite broken down in mental health. Since that time I have been at work with my hands at daily toil, trying to recuperate health and provide for current wants. The health is in large measure restored, and I feel there is yet in me some efficient service for the Liberal cause, but am still tied down by strict necessity with my hands to the daily toil. Can there be an opening made in the Liberal League movement wherein one can work and live? After two or three months I might get release from this hand toil, and if, with a few good lectures and your assistance, I could find my way into such work, it would be what I most desire. I think, if you can interest yourself in my behalf, I can furnish you with satisfactory evidences of the sincerity of my purpose, and of my ability to serve the cause as I propose." Just as in old anti-slavery days, there ought to be lecturers in the field everywhere, forming local Leagues and educating the people in the new necessities of freedom; there are scores all burning to be employed in the work; but nothing can be done until the vulgar dollars are poured generously into the treasury of the National Liberal League. They will come by-and-by—no doubt of that! But it is hard to be patient, when such splendid opportunities of all kinds must be allowed to pass by unimproved.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

INTUITION.

The opening essay of the present issue of THE INDEX is one which is especially entitled to the attention of those who are interested in the question of "intuition." Mr. Wickersham has contributed a very ingenious paper on this subject. He holds that "intuition" differs from ordinary reasoning processes only in being so rapid as to elude the direct grasp of consciousness and therefore to leave no trace in the memory; and he accounts for it by inheritance and habit. The coincidence of elevations and depressions of "waves" of ancestral character, by which he illustrates and accounts for the occasional appearance of exceptionally "intuitive" minds, and the very valuable facts he records with regard to the remarkable mathematical faculty of a near relative, are of high interest for psychological inquirers; while the exquisite little lyric he introduces, on "the thought that's gone I know not where," will enlist the sympathies of every one who has himself had the experience here so poetically described. Our sincere thanks are due to Mr. Wickersham for thus writing out for the benefit of our readers the substance of previous conversations by which we had been much interested.

That the manifestation by certain minds of a capacity of arriving at conclusions with a rapidity greater than is consistent with any clear consciousness or recollection of the mental processes involved, is a fact of not infrequent occurrence, can scarcely be doubted by any one. Popularly and loosely called "intuition," it is one of the facts for which a comprehensive mental philosophy is bound to account; and whatever tends to throw light on the true character of such mental activities possesses an unquestionable scientific value. It is by no means to be taken for granted that so-called "intuitive perceptions" are always correct; as a matter of fact, they are quite as apt to be erroneous as any of the slower and better understood operations of the mind; and it exhibits one of the amusing superstitions of popular thinking to pin one's faith to the accuracy of conclusions merely because no intelligible account can be given of their origin. He who affirms confidently that such-and-such a proposition is true, giving no evidence or reason for believing it, but oracularly announcing it as a truth not to be disputed, often believes himself (and often is believed by others) to be of a superior order of mind, perhaps a seer or prophet behind whom looms the "vast and formless Infinite," and through whom some mysterious and exceptional inspiration is supposed to stream. But such cases are no anomalies; and the assumptions of supernatural backing fade away in the light of scientific analysis. Instead of establishing a generic distinction between "logic and intuition" as totally dissimilar modes of arriving at truth, the one smacking of the earth and the other redolent of heaven, mental science treats them as both merely operations of the same human reason and illustrations of the same laws of thought. Logic understands itself and can test its results by established criteria, while intuition does not understand itself, has no tests, and is just as likely to be wrong as right. Science analyzes all thinking, logical or intuitive, into the same essential elements, and quietly exposes the claims of superiority, unwisely set up on behalf of intuition, as based on nothing but the pride of ignorance. That what is popularly called "intuition" is simply the result of reasoning processes so rapid as to become indistinguishable through consolidation and coalescence, and hence inseparable in consciousness and memory, is an opinion probably familiar to many; but Mr. Wickersham develops the grounds of this opinion, arrived at independently by him, in a very fresh and striking manner. We wish, however, to add briefly here, without going into any exposition in detail, that all reasoning, rapid or slow, consists of a chain of intuitions, properly so called: that is, a series of direct perceptions concatenated in a certain necessary order. The syllogism consists of three propositions, each of which is a direct coupling of a subject and a predicate; and the mental act by which any subject and predicate are coupled together is the intellectual vision and affirmation of their identity (partial or complete). Every such coupling is a putting-forth of intellectual energy necessitated by the intellectual vision or cognition of this identity; and the intellectual vision itself is an intuition, in the truly philosophical meaning of that term. All reasoning consists of a succession of such intuitions or original perceptions, determined by the laws of premise and conclusion; and the term intuition as popularly used is only an abuse of the term as it ought to be used. Whether rapid or slow, whether appearing as "logic" or "intuition," all reasoning consists in the last analysis of these ultimate direct perceptions, which determine the coupling of subject and predicate in every instance; and it is an obscure consciousness of this fact, doubtless, which lies at the bottom of the popular abuse of the word in question. This, however, is a matter that cannot be discussed at length except in some more appropriate place.

GOV. HAYES AND THE "ALLIANCE" AGAIN.

The relation of Governor Hayes to the American Alliance (a narrow, "Know-Nothing," Bible-in-schools secret society) seems to be wrapped in mystery. He is charged persistently by the Democratic papers with being a member of this organization, while the Republican papers as persistently strive to refute the charge. The World and Sun of October 4 published fac-similes of a letter addressed to L. S. Tyler, secretary of the Alliance, by Alfred E. Lee, private secretary of Governor Hayes, which reads as follows:—

COLUMBUS, Ohio, July 10, 1876.

DEAR SIR:—

Governor Hayes desires me to acknowledge receipt of your valued favor of July 7, enclosing resolutions of the American Alliance, and to say in reply that he is deeply gratified by this expression of confidence. The importance of carrying the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut in the approaching canvass is fully recognized, and at the proper time references will be given you to Committees for such aid and cooperation as seems to be desirable.

Very respectfully, ALFRED E. LEE, Secretary.

To L. S. TYLER,
Box 2071, New York.

The World also published, in connection with the above letter, specific statements to the following effect: that the American Alliance Conference, held at Philadelphia on the fourth of July, nominated Hayes and Wheeler as their own candidates; that Governor Hayes received a Committee of the Conference on the next day at the Continental Hotel, in that city, and accepted the nomination; that, on July 9, a copy of the resolutions of nomination, the Constitution of the order, the oath, the address, and a certificate of honorary membership, were presented to Governor Hayes at Columbus, Ohio, by a Committee of which W. T. Black was Chairman; that Governor Hayes "accepted the nomination and honorary membership," and promised formal acknowledgment in writing. Other details are given, including the names of the two Committees. The Tribune, the Graphic, and other Republican papers, pooh-pooh the whole story without venturing to deny the details, which, however, they try to discredit indirectly.

What especially concerns THE INDEX in this matter is the fact that the "Address of the American Alliance to American Voters," republished in THE INDEX of June 22, contains this sentence:—

"The American Alliance recommend that American-born citizens only be elected to official positions of high trust and responsibility, and (while admitting the right of every one to the enjoyment to the fullest extent of his political or religious creed and convictions) favor the keeping of the Bible as the 'cornerstone of our liberties,' and its use in the public schools and other institutions of learning in our land, without any compromise of any kind with any sect whatever."

Nothing could be further from our wish than to be beguiled into crediting an injurious tale about Governor Hayes, or of adopting it hastily as true. The tale, however, if true, is of too much consequence to be disregarded, or to be set at rest by a mere pooh-pooh. If it is false,—if Governor Hayes is really opposed to Know-Nothingism and to such revolutionary measures as the Senate's Bible amendment to the Constitution,—it is due to the public that he explicitly and at once tell the whole truth concerning his convictions on these points. Too much, far too much, is at stake for him to remain silent. Private assurances have been written to us by gentlemen of the highest influence in the Republican party that Governor Hayes is all right on this Bible-in-schools question; and we should personally be entirely willing to take him on "trust," if it were not our duty, as a faithful sentinel, to take nobody on "trust" who declines to give the countersign. When the attitude of the Republican party is so menacing to the principle of State Secularization, which we believe to be of most vital consequence and sure to be made a national issue at no distant day, it would be recreancy to our most sacred convictions not to do our little best towards enlightening the public as to the true situation of affairs. One of two things seems to us easily clear: either that Governor Hayes is at heart a sincere bigot on the school question and therefore a dangerous man to be elevated to the Chief Magistracy of the nation, or else a man who can stoop to coquet with and to deceive an organization of bigots whom he secretly despises. If the whole story can be exploded as a malicious or partisan slander, it ought to be so exploded forthwith; and Governor Hayes ought not to let another sun set without personally denying this charge of Know-Nothingism and bigotry in terms of crystal clearness and manly force.

P. S.—These letters are published in the New York Tribune of October 7:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

Sir,—I wish to correct some mistakes made by persons in commenting upon the letter sent to the American Alliance by Mr. A. E. Lee, Governor Hayes' secretary. 1. Governor Hayes never was a member of the American Alliance. 2. He never saw the Constitution or by-laws of the organization. 3. No committee of this order ever at any time called on him, either at Philadelphia, Columbus, or any other place, for any purpose. We simply informed him by letter that we indorsed his nomination, in answer to which we received the letter from his secretary. That letter was taken from my office, and I was as much surprised as any one can be to see it in print.

I am at a loss to see why Democratic papers should find any fault with the proceedings, as we indorsed Mr. Tilden for Governor two years ago, and he found no fault with it, but on the contrary was very grateful for the assistance, only he requested that it be kept secret, as, if it should become public, he feared he would lose the foreign vote.

Respectfully yours,

LEWEL S. TYLER,
Secretary American Alliance.

NEW YORK, Oct. 6, 1876.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

Sir,—I have received at 10 o'clock this evening a copy of a letter of Lemuel S. Tyler, Secretary of the American Alliance, which I am informed has been sent to you for publication. That letter is only important as admitting the fact that the letter of Albert E. Lee, the private secretary of Governor Hayes, of which a fac-simile was published on the 4th of October, was a genuine letter, and was received by the secretary of the American Alliance. The significance of that letter was that Governor Hayes, through his private secretary, promised "aid and cooperation" to the plans of the American Alliance. This fact seems to be now fully established by the admission of Mr. Tyler.

The writer attempts to break the force of these facts by adding that "we indorsed Mr. Tilden for Governor two years ago, and he found no fault with it, but on the contrary was very grateful for the assistance, only he requested that it might be kept secret, as, if it should become public, he feared he might lose the foreign vote."

This statement is a fabrication. I have no reason to believe, and do not believe, that such a nomination was ever made. I am authorized to say that no such nomination was ever communicated to Governor Tilden, and that he never requested that it be kept private, or made any request on the subject.

D. MAGONE, JR.,

Chairman Democratic State Committee.

SUPERSTITION.

There is an impression among liberals that superstition has lost its power over tolerably instructed minds; that it has slunk away into mental holes and corners; that, as an enemy of mankind, it is disarmed and shorn of power to terrify or charm; that radicals may be content now to let it die in peace, trusting to the general diffusion of knowledge for its complete extinction. A very small acquaintance with people beyond their own peculiar circle will be sufficient to dispel this illusion, and move them to take up again their rusting swords.

The cabin passengers in a Cunard steamship may fairly be presumed to be respectably intelligent people, of the better class in society. In a company that recently crossed the Atlantic, I met day after day, a family group consisting of a mother and daughters, whose cordial manners, intelligent, lively conversation, agreeable dispositions, and easy ways proved them to be acquainted with the best circles of society, at home and abroad. They were not highly cultivated, but they were susceptible of culture in an eminent degree, and under enlightening influences would be sympathetic members of the world of letters and accomplishments. But they were "Orthodox"; not in the angry way of controversialists and dogmatists, but in the habitual, settled, quiet, self-satisfied way of people whose creed contained all their thoughts. Their ignorance was not in the least offensive, their assurance was not in the smallest degree exasperating. But both their ignorance and their assurance possessed that quality of immovable placidity which is more disheartening than any aggressive force. Two or three examples will show how easily superstition of the narrowest kind may be associated with general intelligence and good breeding. On the day before arrival, it was remarked casually, that at the rate of speed we were then making, another twenty-four hours would bring us home. Deo volente! said the eldest lady with sweet solemnity. Deus is apt to be volens, it was rejoined, when his laws were faithfully obeyed. Her blank countenance revealed the absolute inaccessibility of her mind to that rudimental thought. "Strange that men should have been so long in making the discovery that the earth is round!" remarked one of the group with innocent naïveté. It must be because men of science do not read their Bibles; if they did, they would save themselves a great deal of trouble; for David distinctly speaks of "the round world and they that dwell therein." What would she make of Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science? Such Boettian fatness of intellect was never ascribed to infidelity before. Such supreme dignity in remanding Galileo and his army of martyrs to the back closet was never equalled. The mother had been disquieted during the voyage with apprehensions of danger; she was afraid of shipwreck, at broad day, in the Irish Channel, the distant coast on either side being lined with light-houses; she trembled at every shock of the waves against the steamer's side; and although convinced that a special Providence put her on board of that particular vessel and selected her state-room, she questioned in her mind whether the same Providence would succeed in dodging the icebergs and eluding the whales. Her daughter remonstrated, chiding her mother gently for her unwillingness to commit herself without reserve to the Lord's keeping. Her argument was to the effect that the will of the Lord was not to be taken for granted; that his past kindness was no guarantee that kindness would go to the end of the journey. For, she urged, no Christian should go to sea who was not quite willing to be drowned! To the unbeliever this seemed like trusting Providence with a reservation. But to the speaker it did not present itself in so absurd a light. Her mental serenity was unquestionable.

These were amiable people; quite guileless and harmless; their superstition had neither edge nor bitterness. But what multitudes there are who have all the superstition and none of the sweetness; whose ignorance is aggressive; whose unreason is angry and overbearing! Liberals are unwise who have no fear of these. They are rich and strong; they have the popular voice on their side; they have persecuting blood in their veins; they have not unlearned the old ecclesiastical methods of dealing with so-called infidels; they have the "cause of the gospel" at heart, and in characteristic ways, as opportunity offers, will make their power felt. There may be room for differences of policy in confronting them; but can any policy be wise that regards superstition as an outworn chimera?

O. B. F.

SUNDAY AGAIN.

There is every now and then renewed evidence brought to the surface of the continual survival of Puritanism in New England. This has been conspicuously illustrated in Western Massachusetts, within the past few months, in several instances, with respect to the observance of Sunday. A short time since a Jew, having failed to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, by going a-fishing, was summoned before the Court in Westfield to answer for his impiety. There was no intention on the part of the offender, it appeared, to slight the observance. Indeed, it was shown that he was exceedingly conscientious in this particular. It was simply a question between him and his accusers in respect to which day is entitled to the prescribed distinction.

According to the scriptures of his faith (and the Christian prosecutors also), from which he argued his case, it is the seventh rather than the first of the week. "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it."

It was maintained that this command had never been abrogated; that even Christ declared he came not to destroy, but to fulfil what had gone before. It would seem that such a plea, before those who claim that "the Bible is the authority for all law"—and are just now making strenuous exertions to have this statement incorporated into our National Constitution—should have been sufficient to procure an acquittal. But Christians have never been preëminent for acuteness of logical power or consistency. The judge was inexorable. It was decided that a law of the ancient and honored Commonwealth had been broken, and a fine was imposed on the culprit as a penalty.

Still later, in the same town, several barbers were indicted because they had enabled some of their customers to appear with shaven, rather than unshaven faces, by plying their art on Sunday. At Springfield an estimable and capable gentleman, in the newspaper line, the editor and proprietor of a very reputable sheet, the Sunday Telegram, has been brought to trial to answer a similar charge, on account of the issue of his paper on this day, and has experienced much embarrassment of his business in consequence. Proceeding still further Bostonward—toward the boasted effulgent centre whence religious freedom and intelligence radiates over all this continent,—at Worcester, the newspaper boys of the city found themselves, one fine morning this summer, in the clutches of the constables, because they had profaned the Sabbath by perversely endeavoring to turn what they deemed, doubtless, an honest penny as dispensers of intelligence; and some fourteen young men were also arrested for preferring a game of ball to divine service.

As one reads these accounts, and such as these, it is natural to feel prompted to exclaim, in the familiar words of customary pulpit prayer, "Let us thank God that we live in a Christian land, where each can sit under his own vine and fig-tree with none to molest or make him afraid."

But, irony aside, I do not pretend to render a critical judgment in respect to any of the preceding cases. I am not acquainted with all their particulars. It is possible that in each instance there was more to be said on both sides than is here apparent. It may be, for example, to specify a single one in the last mentioned that the young men while playing ball disturbed church congregations in the neighborhood, and would thereby be trespassers on the rights of others, and a cause of legitimate complaint. But, even in view of such hypothetical circumstances, the ball-players should be entitled to some consideration as well as the church people. It might be proper to prevent them from disturbing public worship on Sunday, but it would not be just to prohibit their playing ball anywhere. They had the same right to this use of the day (so long as they did not interfere with the rights of others) as the church people had to theirs. It may have been, indeed, that the recreation and out-door enjoyment thus derived was for them its most beneficial employment. Certainly they should be as competent to decide this as any.

These illustrations seem to exhibit, in very clear and unmistakable light, the animus of the Christian party in the State, its relation to the general government and to individual freedom, its disposition and determination, so far as possible, to override the consciences and rights of those who prefer other modes of thought and action. They show that Puritanism, in its old-time arbitrary narrowness and despotic intolerance, still survives in New England, and not the least in the Bay State, where its miserable and sombre eclipse of the sunlight of life at first appeared.

Puritanism was doubtless a stepping-stone to something higher in the course of progress. Unquestionably we owe it a great debt for its heroism, endurance, and the seeds of liberty which it planted. But how wretched, meagre, and benighted it seems, in the diffused and glowing light, freedom, and intelligence of the present! Who would desire to return to it? It is in spirit as antagonistic to an enlightened and genuine civilization as the Syllabus of his holiness, Pío Nino. Could there be any more conclusive evidence of this than the recent communication of Mr. Dodge to General Newton? It has been the custom of the Church to predict its own destined ultimate triumph, and declare that the "gates of hell" shall not prevail against it. But recent events have seriously impaired the value of such assurances, by proving that the "gates of hell" cannot prevail against the conquering march of scientific and intellectual progress.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY R. C.

Judging from the tenor of many speeches and lectures delivered just subsequent to the civil war, it is evident that not a few excellent people then believed that the gift of the ballot would suddenly convert the Southern freedman into something resembling an angel of light. It is an extremely difficult matter, apparently, for people who became possessed of the above notion to understand that the facts of the past ten years prove conclusively that the freedman is very often a lying and thievish knave, and in many respects is more closely allied to a semi-barbarian than to any civilized being. That the Southern negroes are utterly incapable of self-government, we hold to be proved conclusively by the miserable condition of those States in which they have had longest and most exclusive control. So wretched, in fact, have been their attempts at government that throughout these States to-day the whites take no interest whatever in the questions which disturb our national politics. They care nothing about tariff, or resumption, or silver standard, or civil-service reform, and divide into no parties upon these questions. Parties are divided by the color line, and the whites are occupied solely with the desire of escaping from the rule of the negro and his coadjutor and fellow-scalawag, the carpet-bag white man. All sentiments of poetic justice must long ago have been satisfied by the twelve years' rule of the former slave over his master, and, for the best interests of both races, it is about time now for this unnatural order of things to be done away with.

There is some reason for believing that the more intelligent negroes themselves are at length coming to this conclusion. The Rev. Mr. Dunjee, a colored preacher in Richmond, has written several letters recently in which he urgently advises the blacks to act with and, so far as possible, gain the confidence of the whites. To a gentleman in Massachusetts he writes: "Men at the North seem to forget that the colored men, as a class, are without homes, penniless and uneducated, and that there are three million of them who sleep under the roofs of their former owners with all the brain-power on the side of their old masters." In an open letter to his "colored friends of Louisiana specially, and of the South generally," he says: "There never was a time when the fact was more clearly perceived and felt than the two races, the colored numbering four million, and the whites eight million, have to live together within the limits of the sixteen Southern States, and that can best be attained by the colored people ceasing to antagonize the white race in their political campaigns, and manifesting that confidence politically in them which they daily manifest towards them in their business relations. We see constantly that colored men trust most implicitly to the whites in vital matters appertaining to their contracts for labor, by which they and their families are supported. Why, therefore, should we not equally trust them about our political matters, which are far inferior in their bearing on our well-being?"

Without doubt a return of peace and order throughout the South can only be assured when the intelligent portion of the community—that is, the white race—make and administer the laws. The prolonged continuance in power of ignorance and vice can result only in bringing a State into the present horrible condition of South Carolina, where the failure of negro government is most conclusive, and where we have presented to-day the curious paradox that every well-wisher of the negro must desire the success, at the coming election, of the rebel General Wade Hampton, and the defeat of Chamberlain, notwithstanding the latter's excellent purposes and his attempts at genuine reform. We cannot have a healthy state of affairs in our country until we behold the white men of the South splitting up into political parties like those which divide white men at the North; but this spectacle we cannot hope to look upon so long as Northern orators endeavor to keep alive the old feelings which grew out of slavery and the war.

The political workers of both parties are anxiously awaiting news from Ohio and Indiana; but as the results of the elections in these States will be known to our readers before this reaches them, all speculation with regard to them would be thrown away. If both States should, as, however, seems improbable, declare for the same party by a decided majority, it is generally admitted by newspapers and speakers of both parties that this decision would forecast the result of the coming presidential election.

Judge Hoar's acceptance of an independent nomination for Congress in the seventh Massachusetts district gives promise of a stirring canvass in that district; and his letter of acceptance contained "points" which will be likely to operate upon Butler like bars upon a Spanish bull. There is considerable room for choice among the candidates. Judge Hoar is a pronounced Republican, universally recognized as a man of first-class ability. Mr. Tarbox is an equally pronounced Democrat, and although by no means the equal of Judge Hoar, is, nevertheless, a Congressman of whom no Democrat need be ashamed. It is quite possible, however, that Butler may succeed in defeating both opponents. We have called attention to this district before, and shall probably do so again, for the purpose of making plain the fact that Butler's success therein indicates the existence of a large class of voters who are really a dangerous element in our society; and we believe, moreover, that this element is larger in Massachusetts and some other Northern States than most people have imagined. It is an analogous element to that which in New York elected Tweed to the legislature after his dishonesties had been fully made public, and which hurried for the notorious Jim Fisk throughout all of his scandalous proceedings. We beg leave to suggest to our active tobacco-and-beer philanthropists that they would find in this element a more fruitful subject for study than the miracle at Cana, or the amount of nicotine contained in a cigar-stump.

We desire to call attention to the large number of valuable papers read last week at the meeting of the American Public-Health Association. Papers were read on abattoirs in large cities; "expert" testimony; the construction of public institutions; food, in its relations to personal and public health; illuminating gas, in its relations to health; sanitary requirements in factories; water supplies for large institutions; sanitary reform in ship life; the sacrifice of life and property in unseaworthy ships; marine hygiene; scarlet fever; disinfection in yellow fever; the relation of topographical surveys to public health; the gases of decay; the sanitary condition of country houses and grounds,—and other subjects. Many of these essays were supplemented by equally valuable addresses and discussions; and when we add to the above list the subjects discussed at the recent meetings of the Social Science Association and the Association for the Advancement of Science, it is evident that our country is not lacking in thoughtful men devoted to original research, and who may, we trust, be depended upon in the long run to furnish the needed antidotes for the dangerous element referred to above.

At a meeting of the American Board of Foreign Missions last week, at Hartford, the Rev. N. G. Clark read an interesting paper on "A Century of Christian Progress," taking the ground that the present is "an age of intellectual revolt against the errors and superstitions of the past," a revolt which is not confined to Christian countries. "In India an intellectual revolt is in rapid progress, as a result of the great educational work there going forward. Thousands of young men are passing out of the schools and colleges, no longer able to accept the crude superstitions of their fathers, but untaught in the gospel. The destructive agencies are greatly in excess of the constructive. The old religious faiths are giving way, and no substitute is offered. The missionary agencies are altogether inadequate to the crisis. The golden opportunity is passing. The same is true of Japan. Buddhism, Shintoolism, Confucianism seem fast losing their hold on the popular mind, and multitudes are eagerly waiting for the truth. The millions of China, also, will soon be on our hands." Turkey and Africa were also referred to as fields for missionary work. The speaker urged the necessity of improving the present opportunity; desired to see the organization of "a grand movement to make the next century glorious for the triumphs of the gospel in all the earth"; but recognized the existence of "a secular spirit that finds its way into our higher institutions of learning, turning the thoughts of our Christian youth to mere literary and scientific culture, instead of leading them to consecrate their powers and attainments to self-denying labor and sacrifice for the cause of Christ."

The Hartford correspondent of the Boston Herald relates some very curious proceedings on the part of the delegates to the meeting of the American Board at which the above paper was read. Some three thousand strangers attended the meetings of the Board, and although these were supposed to be good and pious Christians, not a few among them, "in the parlance of the world, would be classed under the profane head of 'beats.'" All visitors were cared for by the people of Hartford, applications for entertainment being made in advance. One man wrote to the Committee on Entertainment, requesting to be provided with a room on the second floor, with a piano, a fire, and other accommodations. A mother wrote asking to be entertained by some family having a good piano, so that her daughter might keep up her practice. A man wrote that he should come with a pair of horses which he desired to have cared for. Some ladies who were entertained devoted the week to sight-seeing, and others to "fall shopping," entirely neglecting the meetings of the Board. A party of six, entertained at one house, spent the entire week in pleasure-hunting; and two men from Vermont, who had requested entertainment, after remaining one night and securing supper, lodging, and breakfast free of expense, pushed on next morning for the Centennial Exhibition. On the whole, we think Mr. Clark had abundant reason to deplore the existence of "materialism and a secular spirit."

We shall be glad to be relieved of the task of getting at the amount of probability contained in the reports which come to us from Serbia and Turkey. Matters have come to such a pass at length, however, that either peace will be soon concluded or other powers will join the original contestants, and a terrible European war will follow. Public indignation against the Turks has become so intense in England that the government is likely to be driven to take more decisive action than it desires. England is really in a bad predicament. In India, her Mohammedan subjects are powerful and dangerous, and are not likely to be confirmed in their allegiance to the "Empress of India" if England is supposed to be hostile to the one who is regarded as being, in some sense, the traditional head of their Church. At the same time the Christian subjects of England cannot remain quiet under the imputation that England's influence is bolstering up a rotten Mohammedan empire, the government of which cannot or does not protect its Christian inhabitants from horrible outrage. The Porte has requested time to consider the propositions for peace presented by the powers, but has been informed by England that they must be accepted without modification. It has also been informed that immediate steps must be taken to compensate, so far as possible, the Christians of Bulgaria; and, without doubt, the prompt acceptance by the Porte of the demands of the powers can alone prevent a most serious war. Turkey is in a very bad fix. Her provinces revolt, and instead of being allowed to punish them for revolution, she is compelled to grant them favors refused before, and to lessen her authority over them. In other words, she is compelled to consent to her own gradual dissolution. This seems to be the fate in store for her, the only alternative being a more sudden dissolution before the armies of Russia, Austria, and Greece.

THE PRIESTLY SPIRIT AMONG LIBERALS.

There is a certain class of liberals in this country, as in Europe, whose position is rather an anomalous one. I refer to those who have outgrown the popular religion, and entertain advanced views which they are accustomed to express in essays or discourses, but who seem to have no real sympathy with or respect for the great mass of liberal men and women, and indeed feel or affect a sort of disdain for the farmer, the mechanic, the workingman, when he in their presence ventures to give utterance to the same views. They act as though they thought that the truth in regard to religion should be expressed only by themselves, in such doses and at such times as they see fit to administer it, and that in their presence no ordinary person should venture to speak his thoughts on religion. This is the old priestly spirit, which in some individuals has survived the doctrines which originated it. What can be more supercilious in a representative of freethought, a teacher of liberal views? If a person is aristocratic or exclusive by nature, he has a right to restrict himself to the society of those who have wealth, social rank, or tastes like himself; but let no man who professes to be a friend of advanced views and of larger liberty and greater independence of thought than the creeds of the churches allow stand aloof from the people, and treat with contempt every utterance of liberal thought that is not clothed in the choicest language. Truth itself is more important than the phraseology in which it is expressed. Too much cannot be said in favor of the highest culture; but the strongest language only can condemn in fitting terms the arrogance, the superciliousness, and inconsistency of men who, in advocating liberal views, treat with scornful contempt or indifference the independent expression of the same views by those who with fewer opportunities of culture are compelled to use plainer and homelier language.

Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.
THORNDIKE, Mass., Sept. 27, 1876.

THE DEMOCRATIC SIDE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I see with surprise that comparatively few of your readers have availed themselves of your invitation to express their political views in the columns of THE INDEX. I am the more surprised, since liberals usually enjoy the reputation of being a strongly opinionated class, and of being in nowise diffident about airing their opinions. May I be permitted to say a few words from the Democratic side? If I talk too long, there is this excuse: I am probably quite alone in my advocacy.

To the liberal there are four paramount questions involved in this campaign, or rather four branches to the one great essential,—civil and religious liberty. The first of these, commonly summed up as the "Catholic question," has received the lion's share of discussion, and from its prominence as an issue may properly claim our first attention.

ROMANISM.—I am far from appearing in the rôle of a defender of that hoary superstition, or as putting the slightest confidence in that myth,—the "liberal Catholic." No one can be more fully alive to the evil influence that the Romish Church exerts to-day, or the repulsive part it has played in the past. But this much every just, fair mind will freely admit: that, however deplorable the tendencies of its teachings may be, they are not legitimate subjects for political agitation or for legislation, except as they interfere with the rights of non-Catholics, or attempt to meddle with the laws of the land. When the question is hewn down to this its proper base, its proportions are infinitesimal. In this State of New York the Catholic vote is exceptionally large; and there has been, and possibly may be again, some trouble in keeping the schools in the large cities strictly non-sectarian. Mr. Eugene Lawrence and the Evangelical press have made charges concerning certain "reformatories" and "protectorates" sustained by State funds, which, in the absence of personal knowledge, I cannot deny. What then? This is one State out of thirty-eight. The power of the Catholic Church is expended in the petty triumphs I have mentioned. If I were to print the number of Catholic voters in this country, those who have never seen the figures would be amazed at their puny dimensions. Unluckily I am unable to give them; but if you will look them up, I am sure you will agree with me when I affirm that their hold upon the country as a whole is scarcely stronger than that of the Mormons. Of course this is my private opinion; and I am aware that it is in antagonism with that of the mass of American voters; but so were the convictions which led us to go to Philadelphia. Popular sentiment is by no means an infallible guide. The great majority of people usually think wrong,—that is, when they think at all; they are perpetually stoning their prophets, and in the end making martyrs of their victims, by adopting the views that were heresies a little before. Public opinion, if we may believe the sectarian and Republican press, is strongly against the Catholics; so, if we may credit Messrs. Hawley, Stevenson, et al., public opinion is against us as radicals. We laugh at the latter; we care nothing for the storm these hypocrites have stirred up around us, for we know we are in the right; but what good reason have we for joining our enemies who misrepresent us, and helping them misrepresent others? The clerical gentlemen who so kindly mentioned us in connection with murderers, incendiaries, thieves, and frequenters of saloons, in Philadelphia last summer, are the ones who are raising this hue and cry about the Catholics to hide their own stealthy advance. If they lie about liberals, why should we think they are telling the truth when they assail Catholics? The cry about the Pope, the Jesuits, and the schools, is cunningly manipulated by the Orthodox leaders. It is ingenious, but it is contemptibly mean; it is the trickery of the politician, not the energy of the broad-minded, truth-loving patriot; they have at heart the interest of their Church, not that of the republic.

PROTESTANTISM.—I have stated my belief that the Catholics were powerless to touch the Constitution; I wish with all my heart I could say as much of the Protestants. I am quite sure that you, Mr. Editor, will join me in saying that in this direction lies our danger. There was no need to organize a league to oppose Romanism. The Catholic Church is explicit; it has certain fixed principles of government which everybody understands, and which thirty millions of Americans are united in regarding as radically wrong; its adherents are in an absurd minority; we know their position and could defend ourselves were they ten times stronger than they are. But how can we resist the other enemy, whose legions are loudest in their professions of devotion to liberty, whose influence stretches into nine dwellings out of ten throughout the land, who is overwhelmingly strong in numbers, prestige, and wealth? The wildest demand for supremacy that Mr. Lawrence can find in his collection of Catholic claims cannot rival the superb assurance of Mr. Stevenson or his comrades who, with less astuteness and more vehemence, told us their aims so clearly last summer. It is no common prize that the National Reform Association is striving for; and it is no common power that they bring into requisition; the whole mighty machinery of the Evangelical churches, the host of interested devotees, the masses who have been for years prepared by the pulpits for church supremacy, the fervid fanaticism of a priest-ridden people,—this is what the National Reform Association means; this is the ogre that looms up between us and the ideal we hope for. Alone we can do nothing; there seems small hope for our little straggling band pitted as it is against a grand army, superb in organization, discipline, and accoutrements. Here is a foe worth watching; and when to its ranks is added the dominant party, our horizon is clouded indeed! Against this terrible array what can we do? What avails ten thousand protests hurled forth in burning words? We can, indeed, vanquish them in logic, on the ground of truth and common-sense; but "fine words butter no parsnips." When all our arguments are exhausted, there is not one vote the less against us, not a single step gained in the struggle. To make the victory practical, to maintain the Constitution unpolluted, to save ourselves and children from being aliens and outcasts in a "Christian land," we must meet them and beat them at the ballot-box, where the genius of American liberty wills that all wrongs shall be righted, and all rights upheld.

Is there any doubt as to the means of making the liberal vote a potent factor in this great problem? Between the two parties in the last session of the Senate, a sharp line was drawn on this issue. A Republican judiciary committee resolved itself into a sub-committee of the National Reform Association, and brought in an amendment practically establishing the Bible in the Constitution and the schools; the Republican senators voted for it; their Democratic colleagues solidly against it. To that minority we owe a brief respite from our impending doom; for you, dear INDEX, know as well as I what footing liberals and all non-Christians will enjoy after our good old secular Constitution is baptized in the name of the Trinity. Can we afford to be grateful for that vote? Or shall we put ourselves in the position of a man who, in a swift current, beyond his depth, with death's clutch upon him, refuses to reach out his hand to be saved, because his would-be rescuer wears corduroys, smells of clay pipe, and might possibly expect a reward? We have all heard the echoing cheers with which Republican conventions greet that ancient plank about "free schools," etc. We all know what free schools mean; what Gov. Hayes and his leaders mean by that stale declaration; precisely what the old American party meant by the disqualification of foreigners,—the supremacy of Protestantism. For my part I had rather trust John Kelley than Joe Hawley. I will place my faith in the party of Paine's and Jefferson's views, and the secular Constitution that is its abiding platform (the outgrowth of eighteenth century infidelity, the pulpits call it now) rather than in those who would graft the Church upon our State, and bring the fifteenth century into the nineteenth.

CENTRALIZATION.—The Constitution made the States a confederacy. Increasing population, commerce, and interests, and certain questions overlooked or evaded then, but momentous in after years, have called for sundry amendments, which—while preserving intact the just rights of the several States—have cemented the bonds between them, and made of them a nation. There are, I know, some elderly gentlemen in both sections who still swear by Calhoun and his "State" ideas, but they are very few, and wholly powerless; to the mass of thinking Democrats, the old cry of "State rights" has no significance; it is dead and out of sight. But while I believe the party accepts sincerely the various amendments, and has abandoned forever its old position, the present administration has carried the opposing idea of centralization far beyond the bounds of common decency, and made Washington in the American, what Paris is in the French republic,—head and front and backbone. Of its trampling upon law in its treatment of the South I will speak briefly below; of the relations existing between the court at the capital and the Evangelical interest, I will say a few words here. I am aware that this caption would furnish material for a score of letters. It is an inextinguishable theme, and a deeply important,—this gradual decay of the rule of the people, and the swift growth of an imperial appointing power; and I cannot but be sorry that space forbids my touching it, and limits me to a hasty glance at one of its multitudinous sides.

In each of the four great upheavals which have convulsed France during the past ninety years, the clergy suffered conspicuously. They had been in each instance the most violent supporters of tyranny, the chief agents in holding its sway upon the people, and when the despotism was overthrown, the shavings were punished with exceptional and signal severity. Personally I cannot refuse my sympathy to the innocent clergymen who were slaughtered during the Reign of Terror, or to Archbishop Darboy and Abbé De Guerry,—murdered in the prison of La Roquette by the communists in 1871; but there is a significant principle lying back of these pathetic passages of history. The instincts of man are usually truer than his judgments; and in the case in hand, the mob, blindly and brutally, it is true, struck at the power that had crushed them. An abbé or a bishop was in their eyes an incarnation of the power that had fostered aristocracy, and poured their necks under the heel of a Bonaparte or Bourbon. They remembered that the young republic had no bitterer foes than the clergy; they had not forgotten that each village curé extolled the plébiscite as of heaven, heavenly; and they vented their rage on what types of the order came to hand. Now, with an apology for the length of this digression, let us apply it to our own time, our own Capital. We have seen lately many striking illustrations of the estimation in which the clergy is held at the White House. We have seen a superb sinecure provided for the Senate chaplain,—Inspector of Consuls! We have seen missionaries sent West to the Indians; they are an essential part of the policy, and the policy has brought forth Sitting Bull and Orville Grant! The expense is trifling, but the precedent is wholly bad. It associates the clergy with the Capital; it introduces them into the lobby; it suggests to them a golden land of promise, before which stands only the secular Constitution; how they will override that, we have seen. Priests thrive in a capital; they fatten in a court. They create a false atmosphere,—born of the false authority they represent, and deadly to republics. Washington is a stench in the nostrils of honest men. The American abroad has enough to blush for now; a priest-ridden capital, a clerical aristocracy, the elevation of the pulpit to the level of the Senate desk, is alone needed to complete our shame. How long will our republic—our loved, honored, vaunted Republic—survive in the hands of men who hate republicanism, who loathe the light, and who sneer at our liberties and rights as the fungi of an infidel age? I am told Mr. Hayes boasts of never having attended a theatre in his life. The power that Orthodoxy wields in Washington may be seen by the jubilant boast of the Statesman: that the Bible clause in the amendment was dictated by agents of the National Reform Association. If they can do that now, what may they not do with a fanatical, narrow-minded bigot in the Executive chair? We have already heard poor Mr. Wheeler mander about New England churches and influence. Will it not be a wilful forging of chains for liberals to vote for men whose campaign is conducted by Sunday-school statesmen and thieves, and whose consciences are in the keeping of Orthodox divines?

THE NEGRO.—I am aware that this is a question of peculiar importance to a majority of INDEX readers. Most of the Abolitionists were led, by the force of logical conclusions, into the liberal line, and it is natural that their old fight should live yet in their memories. I cannot but speak reverently of Garrison and Phillips, but I have equal regard for Sumner and Greeley. In 1872, these latter, in company with other old-time Republicans, bore testimony to the fact that no other people had ever conducted themselves with more moderation and good sense than the Southerners since the termination of the late war. In the Democratic States, Virginia, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia, there is nothing the matter; we never hear of any race-fights there. We say the Southron is hot-headed, prone to hasty action, fiercely prejudiced. Are there no violent partisans North? I remember, as a boy, seeing a Democrat driven from the polls in this quiet little city of Utica; and one of his pursuers, as they rushed past the window, had a musket in his hands, too! We must remember, in considering this question, that the negroes are not a remarkably pacific or orderly class,—even in Boston. Station three is the busiest in the city. I have seen many cases of wanton insult put upon well-dressed white ladies by colored ruffians, right on Cambridge Street. I have seen an elderly white man knocked down and brutally kicked for daring to expostulate with them. If this is possible in the most refined of Northern cities, what must it be in States where they have a majority,—South Carolina, Louisiana? How would you, dear INDEX, like to do business in a county where the clerk and treasurer could neither read nor write? Yet there are such officials in the former State, probably in both. Under the control of Northern adventurers who, supported by Federal recognition and Federal bayonets, manipulate the ignorant colored vote, the condition of some of the Republican States in the South is something pitiable. I believe that the Southern policy, like the Indian, is a contemptible failure. As for outrages, there are two sides to the story, which I will not weary you with repeating. Morton, Kilpatrick, Boutwell, and Butler represent one side; Bayard, Trumbull, Adams, and Nordhoff the other. Can there be any hesitancy about a choice here?

A word about the candidates, and I have done. Whatever else may be said of Mr. Tilden, be sure he shapes his own policy. He has no doubts to confide to his minister, no ear to lend to him in return. He is a man with brains enough to know what we want, and energy enough to do it. No pulpit can mould him, no gossip influence him. Tilden, and no one else, would occupy the executive chair; see what Mr. Hayes has to say in a recent INDEX about the law of 1787, and ask yourself who would dictate the policy of the nation. Mr. Tilden was brought up to reverse the Constitution; Mr. Hayes to reverse the machinery of the Church.

I am, sir, respectfully yours,

HAROLD FREDERIC.

FRENCH DEGREES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I have, perhaps, reason to feel myself specially called upon when justice to France or to the Roman Catholic clergy requires an unintentional mistake to be rectified. In his letter, dated Paris, Aug. 4, 1876 (INDEX Sept. 28), the Rev. M. D. Conway makes the following statement with regard to the collation of university degrees in France:—

"The Church has now exclusive power to grant degrees. This means that it is solely by a vote of Catholic priests that a young man can get his degree, either as a physician or as a lawyer."

Were the venerable champion of liberalism as thoroughly conversant with French as with English matters, he could not have made this statement. What the Roman Catholic Church has recently acquired is not the exclusive right to grant degrees, but the right to grant them concurrently with the University of France, an all-powerful and all-pervading freethinking corporation which, since Napoleon I., possessed, and most tyrannically exercised, an educational monopoly. Young men who had received, in Catholic, Protestant, or other private establishments, an education fully equal to that of the public colleges, were debarred from taking their degrees unless they affirmed, with perjury, that they had been educated, for the last three years at least, in State establishments. No private establishments of instruction of any degree were allowed to exist except under special license from the University. Catholic colleges existed only on the sly, as houses of prostitution do in this country, expecting at every hour of day and night to see the Commissary of Police appear and close them, au nom de la loi. It is that tyranny, abolished by the late Assembly, that the new House of Representatives voted to restore, the Senate not concurring.

Under the law as it now is, though the State University retains some exclusive privileges, private universities, whether Catholic, or Protestant, or freethinking, or purely literary, may be founded, and confer degrees available as those of the State University, for public or professional careers.

I am, dear sir, very truly yours,

JULIUS FERRETTE.

SABBATHARIANISM AT NEWPORT.

NEWPORT, R. I., Sept. 30, 1876.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Redwood Library and Athenaeum held in this city, Sept. 27, 1876, the following resolution was offered:—

"Resolved, That whenever ten or more proprietors shall make a written request therefor, it shall be the duty of the Board of Directors to open the Library Building on Sundays, between the hours of 10 A. M. and 4 P. M., for the use of proprietors and subscribers only, provided that a suitable person can be found to take charge and preserve order without expense to the company. But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the issuing of books or to compel the attendance of the librarian or his assistant."

The resolution was defeated by a two-thirds vote after a discussion, lasting over an hour, in which the affirmative was taken by T. W. Higginson and S. R. Hony, and the negative by H. E. Turner, Hamilton Tompkins, George C. Mason, and others.

Yours,

SAMUEL R. HONEY.

PARIS has been agitated by an untoward incident at the funeral of the composer, M. Frédéric David. The deceased had left instructions by will that his body was to be buried without any religious ceremony. When this was known, the officers in charge of the military escort which had come to attend the funeral, and render the honors due a member of the Legion of Honor, refused to allow his men to accompany the cortege, while many of the mourners also slipped away, so that the body was accompanied to its last resting-place by comparatively few people. As in France the last duties to the dead are reckoned most sacred, this neglect to the memory of an eminent man, greatly respected when alive, has created considerable excitement.—London Graphic, Sept. 9.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.

MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

WM. J. POTTER Sec. F. R. A.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Journal

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY THE

INDEX ASSOCIATION,

AT

No. 231 Washington Street, Boston.

EDITOR:

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 W. H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, England.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

The new Liberal League Tract entitled,
"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"
 contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER,

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers. The

TIME IS SHORT,

Before the vast interests at stake will be settled for years, by Congressional action; and the

NECESSITY IS GREAT

For unselfishness, boldness, and promptitude, on the part of all genuine friends of religious liberty and equality.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies at least ought to be circulated forthwith; and the sooner the better.

Ten Thousand Copies

Are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly mailed, at the bare cost of paper, press-work, and postage, on the following terms:—

Extracts from the Constitution

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

GENERAL OBJECT.

ARTICLE II.—The general object of the National Liberal League shall be to accomplish the TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE: to the end that equal rights in religion, genuine morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood in all human life, may be established, protected, and perpetuated.

MEMBERSHIP.

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

Certificates of Membership

AND

CHARTERS FOR LOCAL LEAGUES

Will be got ready for delivery as soon as possible. But meanwhile let every friend of Equal Religious Rights and Liberties

Enroll his name either as an ANNUAL MEMBER or as a LIFE MEMBER of the National Liberal League.

And let the live Liberals of

EVERY CITY, TOWN, OR VILLAGE in the country unite without delay to forward their

as a local auxiliary Liberal League, in order to be all ready for action as soon as the necessary papers are prepared.
 Before New Year, let a Thousand Liberal Leagues

be thoroughly organized and actively at work for the adoption of the

Religious Freedom Amendment

to the United States Constitution. The party are scheming and laboring more busily than ever for the adoption of their

"GOD-IN-THE-CONSTITUTION"

Christian Amendment,

which would ultimately DISFRANCHISE and DISQUALIFY FOR OFFICE every honest Liberal in the land, and trample under foot the people's most sacred rights of conscience. It is time to rouse the people to an effective defence of their religious liberty, and the Liberal Leagues must do it.

Per order of the Directors of the National Liberal League:

WHOLE NO. 356.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

IT IS STATED that the Italian government has resolved to abolish the religious element in the forms heretofore in use in administering oaths. There is to be no such invocation of the Deity as "So help me God," or "In the presence of the ever-living God." It is simply "I swear," and the usual penalties are retained for perjury.

THE LONDON Times published this dispatch from Barcelona on September 20: "During the past three months the clergy and aristocracy have made a severe attack upon their employés and servants who dare to worship in or send their children to Protestant schools or churches. Hundreds of poor men and women have thus suffered for their faith."

WHAT IS going to become of Dr. Draper? His Conflict between Science and Religion is placed on the "Index Expurgatorius"—the Pope's list of wicked books not to be read by the faithful. But just as the naughty boy wanted to go to Hades because all the "good fellows" were sent there, every heretic should be proud to see his works on the Pope's list because all the good books are found in it.

A SPIRITED PROTEST is made by "Civis" (one of THE INDEX subscribers), in the Newport Daily News of October 7, against the Sabbath laws of Rhode Island, under which some children were recently fined $2.00 each for playing ball on Sunday. Such prosecutions are multiplying all over the country, and the secret of them will not be discovered anywhere but in the growing Orthodox purpose to make this a "Christian" country.

MR. ROBERT C. SPENCER, of Milwaukee, has been appointed to represent the State of Wisconsin on the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, in place of Mr. J. O. Barrett, resigned. Mr. Spencer, it will be remembered, lately drew upon himself the fire of Sabbatarian bigots in the matter of opening the State Fair on Sunday; and this appointment is a mark of respect for his fearless and successful advocacy of equal rights on that occasion. He will undoubtedly prove a most efficient officer.

THE NORTHWESTERN LIBERAL ASSOCIATION was organized by the "liberals and freethinkers of Oregon, Washington Territory, British Columbia, and Idaho," at Portland, Oregon, on the fifth of July. The Secretary, Mr. H. B. Nicholas, has kindly forwarded us a copy of the Constitution and a report of the meeting at which the organization was formed. The latter we shall republish as soon as we can make room for it. The Liberal Association adopted articles embodying substantially the "Demands of Liberalism," and, in the terse phrase of the Secretary, "means to push things." We heartily welcome every such association in the great work now before the liberals of America.

SAYS THE Daily Graphic of September 28: "Dr. William W. Patton, the distinguished Chicago divine, recently gave a powerful address in Farwell Hall to a large and applauding audience in favor of the complete secularization of the public schools. He argued against anything that looks like compulsory religion, would dispense with reading the Bible in the schools, and leave the whole subject of religious education to the family and the church, making the schools the training places of all children, all creeds and races, for the work and duties of everyday life. To adopt any other policy, he maintained, was to play unwittingly into the hands of the Roman hierarchy. It is impolitic to sacrifice the schools for the sake of Protestantism, when the latter does not need and would be damaged by the sacrifice. The country wants educated citizens, and should see to it that nothing shall hinder the education of every child. This view gains eloquent advocates, and seems to be steadily growing in public favor."

ELDER EVANS, of the Mount Lebanon (N. Y.) Shakers, sent recently this original note to the Tribune: "I propose that the American government change the Sabbath to any day of the week except the Jewish or Mohammedan Sabbath day. The Pagan Sunday is, of all others, the most improper. As a Shaker, I and my people observe it as a day of rest, as rigidly as any people. As an American citizen, proclaiming liberty of conscience to all mankind, I protest against the sectarian superstition of closing the World's Exposition on Sunday. It is not the true scriptural Sabbath. The government did right in blowing up Hell Gate on the Sabbath. Now let the Christian clergy blow up the Gates of Hell, open the World's Exposition, free of expense, to the world's poor, on the remaining Sabbath days. Then we may keep any day, and as many Sabbath days as we please, unmolested. And we—Jews, Quakers, Catholics, Materialists, Atheists, and Protestants—will all unite and keep any day the American government may appoint as a day of rest to man, beast, and cook. F. W. EVANS."

LAST SATURDAY'S Tribune published a remarkable letter on "intimidation in South Carolina," by "a white native of the State who is not a Republican," and of whom the editor says: "Our correspondent is in a position to be well informed, and we believe him to be honest." This gentleman testifies that a great "Confederate revival" is in progress there; that the whites are everywhere arming and drilling; that the ex-Confederates are in command, and propose to carry the election on the "Mississippi plan," by the shot-gun and revolver; that General Wade Hampton is the willing representative of their purpose; that Republican meetings are openly captured by bands of armed soldiers, and broken up in terror; that murders of negroes, assassinations of white Republicans, mobs, riots, and intimidation of all sorts, are resorted to as a means to the restoration of the Democratic party to power. If this testimony is true, the election of Wade Hampton would be a curse to South Carolina and to the United States, and above all others to the freedmen, who, abandoned by the North, would lie prostrate at the feet of pitiless and revengeful fire-eaters. Such a state of things justifies the employment of the whole military power of the nation to protect the freedom of the ballot-box and the rights of the menaced negroes. This is the paramount issue in South Carolina, and we hope to hear yet that Wade Hampton and his horde of murderers are beaten off the field.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Essence of Christianity.

BY CHARLES E. WHIPPLE.

Among disputed points in this world, no one is more disputed than the question, What is Christianity? If you inquire what are the particulars by virtue of which one man becomes a Christian, while his neighbor, apparently as good as he, remains not a Christian, you get from the doctors and teachers of Christianity a vast variety of answers. Some of these answers are obscure through mysticism, seeming to be designed only for persons of a peculiar habit or constitution of mind; but all of them are obscure through indefiniteness; and the same characteristic pervades the very extensive literature of the subject. I know of no definition of Christianity to be found in books which would give an accurate idea of it to one previously unacquainted with it. It is not unreasonable, however, to require that a "definition" define its subject; mark out the boundaries of it; render it intelligible to a candid person of average capacity. In the absence of such needed accuracy of statement, is it not well to raise a question concerning it? Possibly my attempt at a definition may stimulate some competent person to do the work more thoroughly.

It would seem that the doctrine of "the Christ" must be the central and vital idea of Christianity; and the churches which call themselves Christian, differing in a vast variety of other particulars, agree in identifying "the Christ" with Jesus of Nazareth. Many Jews, and many persons stigmatized as infidels, have expressed veneration for the character, and admiration of the precepts of Jesus, and have illustrated these precepts in their lives at least as thoroughly as the majority of his professed followers. These persons, however, are not Christians, because they do not accept Jesus as "the Christ." Moreover, respecting and honoring Jesus as they may, they do not accept all the doctrines, nor obey all the precepts attributed to him, but consider themselves free to choose among these, as among other sources of knowledge, according to the dictates of their own reason and conscience; whereas the Christian churches, differing in whatever else, agree in attributing to Jesus the right of absolute rule over them, and the duty of regulating reason and conscience by his decisions.

May not these facts help us towards a correct definition of the thing in question? First, however, we should understand the origin and significance of this term "the Christ," which is the corner-stone of Christianity.

"Christ" is a Greek translation of the Hebrew word "Messiah," which had its origin in Old Testament history, and which means "the Anointed," or "the Lord's Anointed." This term was first used in relation to the consecration of David as king, by anointing with oil, he having been designated by Jehovah for that purpose, according to the record. The Messiah, the predicted great deliverer, was also to be the Lord's Anointed, being predestined to sit on the throne of David, as well as to be born of his blood. Thus it came to pass that, whenever a great religious reformer arose in the Hebrew nation, the question was raised concerning him, "Is not this the Christ?" And, the records inform us, very early in the ministry of Jesus, this question was raised concerning him.

The first followers of Jesus were so attracted by the majesty and nobleness of his character as to be irresistibly impelled to leave all and follow him. It is evident that they confidently expected him to take the Messianic position, and that they were disappointed and puzzled, throughout his whole ministry, by his failure to take it in the manner they expected.

The want of chronological accuracy in the Gospel narratives leaves us uncertain at what period of his ministry Jesus consented to be acknowledged as the Christ. He was early beset with solicitations to assume that character, sometimes by the apostles, sometimes by individual Jews, sometimes by portions of the people. To entreaties of this sort he generally gave obscure answers, and he took pains to escape from a multitude who wished to make a public demonstration in his favor. On one or two occasions, however, he seems to have claimed Messiahship in conversation with his disciples, to have praised them for discerning that he bore that character, and to have promised eminent advancement to the twelve apostles when the kingdom should have been attained, though even then he charged them to tell no man that he was the Christ. A time soon came, however, when their hope was destroyed, and their whole enterprise seemed a failure.

When Jesus was seized to be crucified, we are told that all the disciples forsook him and fled. Not long after, however, we find them preaching with the utmost boldness and perseverance, and calling upon Jews and Gentiles to accept Jesus as "the Christ," and also as Lord and Master. It was while proselytizing thus, the record tells us, that they were first called "Christians." This took place at Antioch, probably within the first half-century of the Christian era, and the words Christian and Christianity have gained larger and larger acceptance from that time to the present.

As I have said above, all the great sects of Christians now teach the same doctrine, the preaching of which caused its receivers to be called Christians at Antioch. It seems fair to assume that this concord shows what are the essential elements of Christianity. I judge, then, that—Christianity is the doctrine that in Jesus of Nazareth were fulfilled the predictions of Hebrew prophets concerning "the Messiah" or "the Christ," and that Jesus, as the Christ, is rightfully the spiritual Lord and Master of all men.

The latter of these particulars seems to be a deduc-tion from the former. At least it is held as an article of faith by those only who hold the former. The identification of Jesus with "the Christ," a matter in which the professors of Christianity have been agreed from the beginning until now, may fairly be considered the key of the Christian position.

I have assumed, above, that a definition of Christianity ought to be so framed as to convey to an intelligent inquirer, previously unacquainted with that subject, an idea of it at least approximately accurate. The definition there suggested is, in fact, only an expansion of the formula most common in the mouths of all propagandists of that faith,—"the Lord Jesus Christ." Let us suppose an intelligent Japanese accosted with this formula by a Christian missionary, and presented with two documents in demonstration of its correctness; the biographical records of Jesus in the New Testament, by way of fact, and the prophetic details of the Old Testament, by way of authority.

To our instructed Japanese, it must be remembered, neither the formula nor the documents can have the sort of imposing prestige with which they come to Moody and Sankey's hearers in this Christian land. To him, the documents received are not yet "God's Word," nor even "the Holy Bible," but a book like other books, to be examined and judged of. To him, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, Peter and Paul, are not dictators, but men, who may fairly be supposed to have written what they really believed, but whose opinions are to be examined, and judged of, if possible, by comparison with the documentary evidence upon which they were founded. The miracles make no impression upon him, because he has long been familiar with the assumption of similar ones in the documents of his own religion, which (being really well instructed in the learning of his own country) he has long since found to be without competent evidence. He knows what evidence is, and he inquires whether there is competent evidence for the doctrine newly presented to him.

There is one point, where the full scrutiny of the evidence is clearly within his reach. The documents collectively called "the Old Testament" were in existence in their present form, and in the hands of the Hebrew people, five hundred years or more before the birth of Jesus. If these documents clearly described, so long in advance, what the life and character of Jesus would be, and if the character and career of Jesus really made good that which was predicted concerning a Messiah, there would be strong presumptive evidence in favor of the divine origin of the new religion. Clearly, the scrutiny of the inquirer must begin at this point, and of the correspondence, or the want of it, between recorded prophecy and recorded fact, he is as competent to judge as any of the doctors or the councils who for eighteen hundred years have been uttering opinions upon that matter.

The missionary has kindly pointed the new inquirer to what he considers salient and convincing points in the department of fulfillment of prophecy. And the inquirer really finds, here and there in Old Testament literature, expressions verbally corresponding to alleged circumstances in the life of Jesus. It plainly appears, from one or more of the four biographical narratives, that Jesus was "despised and rejected"; that he was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief"; that he came, on one occasion, "riding on an ass"; that "they pierced his hands and his feet"; that in his thirst "they gave him vinegar to drink"; that "they parted his garments among them, and cast lots upon his vesture"; etc., etc. These resemblances, the inquirer will observe, really exist; but he will also observe several other things; namely, that these coincidences generally relate to incidental and unimportant matters; that one or two of the evangelists are so bent upon multiplying instances of this sort that they misquote or pervert Scripture in the attempt to show that this or that act of Jesus was foretold; that in sundry of the passages claimed as Messianic predictions pointing to Jesus, the prophet or psalmist is obviously describing himself, or other persons or events in his own time; and finally, that in no one of these passages do all the connected incidents fit the character of the career of Jesus, so as to make a probability that they were intended to refer to him. Casual and partial resemblances occur; but in no one case is it manifest that prophetic foresight distinguished and described the coming of Jesus.

But when the Japanese inquirer proceeds from minor matters, like the above, to examine the main features of the work which the Messiah, according to Hebrew prophecy, was to perform, he finds, instead of coincidence or resemblance, the strongest possible contrast to the career of Jesus. This prophecy, delivered while the Hebrew people were suffering oppression from foreign nations, announced a Messiah to come, a branch from the root of David, who should deliver them from their oppressors, avenge them on their enemies, and establish them permanently in their own land, under a paternal government, never more to suffer oppression or invasion. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and others of the writers of their Scripture, positively declared that a lineal descendant of David, sitting on the throne of David, should collect the Hebrew people again in Palestine, and rule them there, in peace and righteousness, forever. These are the main features of that Hebrew prophecy which has been called Messianic, and therefore these were the things looked for to be accomplished by the Christ, whenever he should come. The gospel narratives show that precisely these were the things expected of the Christ, not only by Jews generally in the time of Jesus, but by his twelve apostles, through his whole ministry, and even after his crucifixion.

The Japanese inquirer learns from the secular history of the last eighteen hundred years that not one of the things thus predicted and expected has been accomplished. But he also learns from the Gospels that Jesus never even attempted to accomplish one of them. The Messiah was to be a conquering leader, assailing and overthrowing the enemies of Israel, crushing them in his anger, trampling them in his fury. Jesus, when accused of aspiring to be a king, declared to Pilate that his kingdom was not of this world. The predicted kingdom of Messiah was to be of this world, was to be exercised in Palestine by the expulsion of the Roman invader, was to overthrow all Gentiles who sought, like Pilate, to maintain a foreign rule over the chosen people. Jesus was content to pay tribute to Cæsar. He discountenanced the efforts of the people to make him a king. He wished to gather them together, as a teacher, not at all as a political or revolutionary leader. He practised, as he taught, non-resistance to injury. He would not allow his disciples to fight, either for Hebrew independence or for his own deliverance. His life accomplished something far better than that permanence and supremacy of Judaism which Messiahship contemplated, but it did not accomplish Messiahship.

A discriminating study of the missionary's own documents, the Old and New Testaments, will necessarily show to the inquiring Japanese, as to so many Americans and Europeans of the present day, that the epithet "Christ," in its original signification, does not belong to Jesus. Though greater and better than a realized Messiah would have been, he was not the Messiah.

I have spoken of the original signification of these words, Messiah and Christ. But is not that original signification the only proper one? The idea of a Messiah, originating with the Hebrew people, founded on their manners and customs, and expressed in their phraseology, has been a valued possession of that people for at least twenty-five hundred years. Faith in its realization has sustained them through reverses and misfortunes altogether unparalleled, and, still abiding, it holds them together as a people, though they have ceased to be a nation. They have a right to the idea, and to the phrases expressing it; and it is unjust to them, as well as unjustifiable in itself, to pervert these historical terms to an application to once foreign and alien; a meaning contradictory alike to the Scriptures of their ancestors, and to the faith still cherished in their own hearts.

If the definition of Christianity above given is correct (a matter in regard to which I hope the views of others will be published), that system is proved unsound by the very documents on which it relies for authority. That which Messiah was to accomplish, according to the prophetic portions of Old Testament Scripture, has not been accomplished at all, and of course was not accomplished by Jesus. And the pretence of such accomplishment in a mystic, figurative, or spiritual sense is equally destitute of foundation. If "Messiah" means anything, it means that one in the line of David should come and rule over the Jews as king in the land of Palestine. But that people have never accepted Jesus as Master or Lord in any sense whatever. They have steadily rejected his doctrine as well as himself for eighteen hundred years, and Christian missionaries have made fewer converts from Judaism than from Islamism or any of the great heathen religions.

Nevertheless, Christianity, like the delinquent church in Sardis, has "a name to live," and gives much proof of vigor as well as vitality. Now, and probably for centuries to come, in every nation called Christian, he must "lose caste" who renounces it. For many generations yet, no doubt, the Christian clergy will contend against the theist as rancorously as against the atheist, calumniating the persons, and misrepresenting the doctrines. The signs of the times, however, indicate a steady increase of free inquiry, and a confidence in the ultimate victory of truth; and those who find the truth know full well that they have gained something better than the approval of a present majority.

PHILADELPHIA LETTER.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—According to the official returns to date, over four and one half millions of people have visited the Exposition, exclusive of exhibitors, attendants, newspaper reporters, and others holding free tickets. This number of paying visitors to the Centennial Exposition exceeds by more than one million the entire number who visited Vienna during the one hundred and eighty-six days which it was open.

Yesterday, the 28th of September, was the Centennial anniversary of the adoption of Pennsylvania's original Constitution. It was therefore very appropriately Pennsylvania's day at the Centennial Exposition, the day for her special celebration as one of the thirteen original States. It was a proud day for Philadelphia. The public buildings and business and dwelling-houses upon the principal streets were gayly decorated with the flags of all nations, emblematical of a welcome to all peoples. The schools were closed, and business was generally suspended throughout the city. Over two hundred and sixty-three thousand people gathered inside the Exhibition grounds to do honor to the day and to the work of the century. Reception were held in the Pennsylvania State Building, the Philadelphia City Building, and the Judges' Hall, by the Governor of the State, the Mayor of the City, and the Women's Centennial Executive Committee respectively. Addresses were delivered, the burden of which was the great work of the Exposition, Pennsylvania's part in the work, and a contrast of her present population, developed industries and resources, with those of one hundred years ago. Of course no one spoke of her unjust laws, which, notwithstanding the declaration of her original Constitution of the right of all to freedom of conscience, discriminate between the rights of the Atheist and the Christian; nor of her numerous and overcrowded almshouses, jails, and prisons, the product of the century, though a blot upon her civilization; nor of the unparalleled number of homes sold by the sheriff during this Centennial year; nor of the thousands of men and women, citizens of Pennsylvania and of this great republic, who could not join in this celebration for want of proper clothing and a fifty cent note; nor of the great army of the unemployed compelled to become tramps or criminals in order to obtain the necessities of life. Why should these things be mentioned? 'Tis well to recount the past and joyfully to note the success gained; but we must not forget that the great problem of freedom—freedom to be and do,—the social problems of existence, government, and industry, are not yet solved.

Very little could be seen of the Exposition, so immense was the crowd. Every building and every avenue of the buildings were thronged. The grounds were one vast living panorama, and outside the gates the crowd was scarcely less; yet good order and politeness everywhere prevailed except in the one particular of smoking. I cannot understand how men can indulge in this filthy and intemperate habit, or by what argument they can justify such pollution of the atmosphere which others are compelled to breathe. It is the freedom of license, not liberty. The Exhibition buildings were closed as soon after the usual hour as possible, but the grounds, which were brilliantly illuminated, remained open during the evening, cloudless and scarcely less light than the day. At 8 P. M., from George's Hill, there was a magnificent display of fireworks, prepared for the occasion, and seldom equalled. This was the closing feature of the day's celebration, after which the people quietly dispersed to get home the best way they could. Thousands were compelled to walk for want of any possible conveyance. I write thus explicitly, because Pennsylvania's day is not only the maximum day of our Exposition thus far, but the number in attendance exceeds by over seventy thousand that ever assembled on any one day at any of the great International Exhibitions of the world.

Last Sunday, President Grant and wife, accompanied by Mr. Sartoris, Secretary Borie and wife, Secretary Fish and wife, George W. Childs and wife, Robert E. Coxe, of Washington, and several others, visited Memorial Hall, and were received by the Superintendent of the Art Gallery. At 2 P. M., they lunched with the British Commissioner, at the house of the British Commission, and were the guests of Mr. Childs at his residence in the evening. So the Centennial Exposition is again open on Sunday to distinguished visitors.

'Tis true President Grant cannot see the Exposition on any other day, so closely is he followed by a toadying crowd eager to do homage to sovereignty. I do not wonder that foreigners regard us with commiseration, as a people who think ourselves free, but who have no greater freedom and no more independence of character than has the subject of a constitutional monarchy. But what is to become of our example as a Christian nation to foreign and heathen peoples, when our representative head thus violates the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath? Our Zoological Gardens are open every Sunday, and last Sunday there were twelve thousand paying visitors; and Hell Gate explosion occurred the same day. Think of it! Ought we not to be visited by the plague as a retribution? I cannot see any reason why the people of Savannah should be the first sufferers; however, this is quite consistent with the Christian idea of divine justice.

Egypt, Tunis, Algiers, Morocco, Liberia, the Orange Free State, and Cape of Good Hope are the countries of Africa represented here at our Exposition. Of the exhibits of Egypt I have before spoken at length. Since that time a well-preserved mummy of an Egyptian priestess or princess of the age of the Pharaohs, presented some years since by the Khedive to the Prince of Wales, but retained at Luxor, recently obtained by Dr. Curry for the Baptist College Museum, at Richmond, Va., has been placed on exhibit at the World's Ticket Office, No. 84, at the Centennial grounds. The mummy case is rich in Egyptian figures and inscriptions, descriptive of her ladyship as a priestess, and giving extracts from the "ritual of the dead." The latter represents the soul as undergoing a conflict after leaving the body, and before reaching the heavenly sphere. The coffin contains prayers for help against evil demons. It is interesting to compare this mummy with those of ancient Peru.

The exhibit of Tunis is in the Main Building upon the south side of the main aisle, and east of Japan. The space is enclosed with a scarlet silk cord, strung between ornamental posts. Upon three sides of the enclosure is an entrance, over which is displayed the scarlet flag with crescent and enclosed star in white. In the rear of the enclosure is a Tunisian villa represented, having three entrances in front, over each of which, in a crescent-shaped doorway, hang ornamented lanterns of curious form, somewhat resembling the Chinese lantern. The dome of this enclosed pavilion is surmounted by a gilded pyramid, upon which are placed three gilt balls of different sizes, the smallest at the top, supporting the ensign of the nation in gilt. The wall of the pavilion is in part ornamented, in part covered with silk hangings of native manufacture, and curiously but neatly ornamented with silk patches of various colors. This is expressive of the custom among the wealthy of Tunis to ornament the walls of their dwellings with silk hangings. No one papers the wall there. Silk door curtains of similar design are here displayed. Upon the outside of the pavilion wall are hung carpets, cloths, and rugs of native manufacture, designed for sale here.

The principal exhibit, including the pavilion, is by Mohammed Sadek, the Bey of Tunis; that is, by the government. Tunis is nominally a dependency of Turkey, but is really under the absolute control of the

Bey. The Bey owes no tribute and no obedience to Turkey, except that he is nominally restrained from making war or ceding territory without the consent of the Sultan. The government exhibit shows that agriculture is but little understood in Tunis, whatever may be the soil. The agricultural implements are exceedingly primitive, and consist of a plough and threshing. The plough is made of two pieces of wood; one of these, the ploughshare, is shod with iron, and crosses the beam at a sharp angle; the threshing resembles the old-style New England drag with the bottom stuck full of sharp stones. The grain is placed upon the floor and this instrument drawn over it. It is apparently very heavy, but worked by hand. Corn, barley, wheat, beans, caraway, and coriander-seed constitute the agricultural products exhibited. A few cases of manufactured goods are exhibited, including musical instruments exceedingly crude; arms and armor, among which is a Damascus sabre; a crusader's falchion with cross and crescent on the blade; bottles of perfumery, including attar of rose and jessamine, of which much is manufactured in Tunis, and which is here for sale; a full set of gold, silver, and copper coins, ranging in value from one-half cent to $12.50 of American gold; gold and silver tea-sets and jewelry, finely ornamented; a silver incensory and aspergill, articles used in worship; pastilles burned as incense; some articles of pottery; several cases of garments, interesting as showing the style of costume (among these is an entire suit for a Moorish gentleman, of scarlet worsted cloth embroidered in green); also the complete trousseau of a Moorish bride, made of pure white silk, and so heavily embroidered in gold and silver as to render the weight of the garments oppressive; opera cloaks, shawls, and burnouses of snow-white silk, a garment to be worn about the head, so arranged as to fall over the back of the neck; slippers; cushions embroidered in gold; a Bedouin hat made of straw, and ornamented with tassels and feathers; a richly embroidered saddle, reminding us that leather is one of their principal articles of export; a mirror with tortoise shell and mother of pearl inlaid frame; a case with glass front, tripods and brackets, all inlaid with the same materials.

The most interesting exhibit of Tunis is the mosaic lion. It was found within the precincts of the Byrsa of Carthage, near the site of the temple of Astarte, the Juno of the Phœnicians, and is supposed to have formed a part of the pavement of the temple dedicated to Diana, and to be two thousand years old. The boldness of the design, the coloring, attitude, and position of every limb, exhibit masterly skill in the artist, and assign it to the most flourishing period of Carthage. In the mouth of the lion is a horse or other animal with hoofs, the blood trickling from his wounds. This is the only mosaic taken from the ruins unutilized. It is now enclosed with a wire-netting for preservation, so great is the tendency of visitors to try to secure some of the stones of which it is composed, which are but one quarter of an inch square, as relics. Upon the eastern side of the enclosure is the exhibit of a merchant doing business in Tunis and Paris, who evidently intends his exhibit here as a speculation. He exhibits some brazen urns of unknown age, upon which are representations of birds, beasts, and human figures, which seem capable of interpretation. Whether they are hieroglyphical in their character or simply designed for ornamentation, they exhibit a good degree of art. The most valuable of these have been bought by the Boston Museum of Art. They are said to have been unearthed at Carthage filled with gold.

Here are offered for sale silks of quite pretty patterns, but of little body; silk handkerchiefs exceedingly like those being woven in Machinery Hall, by the New Jersey weavers, but which the exhibitor tells you came directly from Tunis and are of Tunisian manufacture; also numberless trinkets, jewelry, portemonnaies, etc., which are decidedly uninteresting because you feel them to be of doubtful origin.

A Tunisian café or restaurant is on the grounds, in which coffee and ice-cream are served to ladies, while young male bipeds sit by their sides smoking from pipes six feet long, these pipes and their feet placed upon rests which are as high as the tables,—a disgusting sight indeed. As I passed through, I wondered what could have been the education of these young women, that they should be so devoid of self-respect. Natives dressed in native costume attempt to entertain with exceedingly unmusical vocal and instrumental music.

The exhibits of Algiers and Morocco arrived too late to obtain space in the Exhibition buildings, and are therefore in small villas upon the grounds. They are quite like those of the Tunisian merchant, but of greater variety, and include more really useful articles, and are all offered for sale.

The villa of Morocco is furnished to represent the several apartments of an inhabited native palace, from which something of the customs of the East may be learned.

The exhibit of Liberia, commercially speaking, is the most interesting of all the countries of Africa. It will be remembered that Liberia is a young republic, situated upon the western coast of Africa, having an area three times as large as Massachusetts, and a population less than Philadelphia. It is a little more than a quarter of a century old, is modelled after the United States government, and is the child of the American Colonization Society. Its population is made up of the native African and the descendants of the American-born negro. The government of Liberia, which is entirely in the hands of colored men, accepted the invitation to be represented here at this Exposition, and appropriated $10,000 with which to make the exhibit; but having been since involved in war with the interior tribes of Africa, it has been compelled to rescind the appropriation, and is therefore here represented only by E. S. Morris &

Co., a firm owning a large estate in Liberia and doing business in Philadelphia. Mr. Morris has been a resident of Liberia for fifteen years, and is now our resident commissioner. He has done much for the development of the resources of that republic, and is enthusiastic over its future prospects. He says his "mother rocked him in the cradle to open the door of heathen Africa to Christian America." His hope for Liberia's more in the native African than in the American African; because the latter's idea of freedom is to imitate the white man; that is, to be free from work; while the native African is eager for knowledge, and his idea of freedom is to do and be.

The exhibit of this young republic is in Agricultural Hall, upon the eastern side, near the central entrance, and is principally of those products which form the commercial resources of Liberia. It consists of palm oil put up in jars hermetically sealed, palm oil soap, coffee, hulled and unhulled, burnt and raw, sugar, indigo, arrowroot, cocoa, ginger, ivory, camwood, hard woods, and iron ore, all of which it offers in exchange for school-books, agricultural implements, dry goods, hardware, provisions, canned fruits, "everything but rum."

Palm oil obtained from the nut of the tree, when fresh, is sweet to the taste, and has an odor like violets. It is used freely by the natives, among whom skin diseases are unknown. It is also used for cooking purposes, and as an emollient for the joints. The soap here on exhibit was evidently made of the palm oil before it had become rancid, has no artificial perfume, and is very fine for toilet purposes.

Several thousand pounds of the Liberia coffee have been here sold since the opening of the Exposition. It is put up in pound packages. It is claimed that this coffee is heavier and richer than the Java or Mocha, and requires less to produce the same quantity for drinking. Among other testimonials of its value, Mr. Morris has a letter from Professor Silliman, in which, after referring to the French method of mixing coffees in order to obtain both body and flavor, he says: "The Liberia coffee is superior in body and color of infusion and quality of flavor. In fact, I know of no other coffee which alone is so excellent in all these respects as the Liberia." He suggests that botanists may yet find it a new and distinct species. Here are also on exhibit a coffee-huller and sifter, an African canoe, a glass jar of cowrie shells, used as money, flax from St. Helena, native African loom and shuttle, the entire weight of which is less than two pounds, robes for an African chief made of strips of cloth woven in the loom, four and one-half inches in width, and sewed together. They are dyed with camwood and indigo, and ornamented with Mohammedan characters. Coffee berries and souvenirs made from the half berry set in gold are here sold to increase their school fund. Liberia has nearly one hundred Christian churches, but very limited educational privileges, and prints but one newspaper. From a copy of this paper, of which Mr. Morris is the editor, and the price of which is one bushel of unhulled coffee per annum, I learned that great evil is apprehended from intemperance, which ever follows in the wake of Christian civilization. It is a common saying among the Mohammedans, when they see one of their number drunk, "That man has left Mohammed and gone to Jesus." The missionaries admit that "the Hindu is actually safer from the vices of intemperance in the profession of heathenism than in the profession of the Christian religion." From this I conclude that possibly the hope of Africa lies partly in the steady progress of Mohammedanism among the native tribes, which somewhat hinders the growth of Christianity. Social scientists might do well to note these facts in solving the problems of social life.

The flag of this young republic is similar to our own, save that the stripes of red and white are narrower, and upon the background of blue there is but one solitary white star. I had almost forgotten to mention the very suggestive exhibit of photographs of native African boys, taken upon their arrival in this country; also after they had received two years school-training at Lincoln Institute. Most of these boys are preparing for the Christian ministry. What a pity that they could not be educated in science, that we might see whether they would naturally grasp the grand idea of evolution, or whether they would substitute the Christian's God for their heathen deities!

Near the north-eastern entrance of the Main Building is the exhibit of the Orange Free State, a republic situated in South Africa, north-east of the British Cape of Good Hope. This republic, settled by Dutch emigrants, was formerly a British colony, and gained its independence in 1854. It has an area about five times that of Massachusetts, with a population less than three hundred thousand, many of whom are native Africans. Its government is administered by an elective president and a legislative assembly of one house, called the Volksraad, or People's Council. The exhibit is made by the government through their consul, resident in the United States. It is more artistic, bespeaks more wealth and culture, than does the exhibit of Liberia. Four cases of stuffed birds of brilliant plumage, one exclusively of aquatic birds, also two cases of insects, are within the enclosure, and prove to us that the inhabitants of the Orange Free State are not strangers to natural history.

A central pyramidal glass case, upon the top of which stands a miniature statue of a miner with pickaxe and spade, contains precious stones, diamondiferous soil, and diamonds in the rough, one of which is valued at $8,000, and attracts much attention.

Notwithstanding her mineral wealth, wool-growing is the chief industry of the people of the Orange Free State. During the year 1875, this little Dutch African republic exported nearly $4,000,000 worth of wool. Of this product she makes a fine and attractive exhibit. Add to this horns, skins of wild animals, including the giraffe, lion, and leopard, ostrich plumes and eggs, woods (among which you find the olive, sandal, and blue-gum woods), coal and petrified wood, wheat, Indian maize and Kaffir corn, which seems to be of a fine quality, dried peaches and apricots, fruit of the cream of tartar plant, and you have the natural products here exhibited. The cream of tartar fruit is especially interesting because of its novelty. It is a gourd, in shape like a goose egg, but twice as large. Its seeds are surrounded by a pulp, which, when dry, becomes a white powder said to possess all the qualities of cream of tartar. A few manufactured articles, such as rhinoceros whips, boots, baskets impervious to water and used as water vessels, a harness, a model of a transportation wagon capable of carrying fifteen thousand pounds of wool, wooden figures cut out with a pen-knife and intended to express something of the life of the nation, but no woven goods, are exhibited.

The exhibit of the Cape of Good Hope is in the Main Building near the exhibits of other British Colonies. Its natural products are, of course, not unlike those of the Orange Free State just described. They are, however, rather unartistically arranged in a small but well-filled enclosure. Encircling the entrance of the enclosure are two huge elephant tusks eight feet long and thirty-three inches in circumference, the largest in the Exposition. Over them is displayed the British coat-of-arms and the penguin, a very large and peculiar bird. Ostrich-farming is the most profitable industry of this colony. A young ostrich seven days old is worth $50 in their market. The attendant very kindly explains to you the ostrich incubator, a model of which is here on exhibit, and the general processes of ostrich-farming, together with the method of curing the plumes. Some very pretty baskets ingeniously made from the shell of the ostrich egg, some necklaces of melon seeds and pearls, and other articles of home manufacture, are in the case of manufactured goods. A table-cloth made entirely of cotton, but of such excellent quality it might easily be taken for linen, shows the necessity of the linen-test in the purchase of goods. Upon the central stand are forty distinct kinds of wine made from the Constantia grape,—a species of grape peculiar to Southern Africa. The work here exhibited is not the work of the native African, the population of this colony being made up of French, German, Dutch, English, and American peoples.

In my next I will write of Australia and the Islands of the Ocean. CARRIE BURNHAM KILGORE.

REV. MR. BRADFORD ON THE SCHOOL AMENDMENT.

[The substance of the following letter, addressed to Col. Forney, was published in the Philadelphia Press of the 25th August. But as that paper is comparatively local in its circulation, and as the question which the letter discusses is one of national importance, we give it place in THE INDEX, whose readers are to be found in nearly all the States of the Union.—ED. INDEX.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS:—

In the tri-weekly Press of the 17th August you have an editorial article in praise of the Senate Judiciary Committee's substitute for the House Resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbidding appropriations of money to sectarian schools. Upon this article I respectfully ask leave to offer a few words of criticism.

The very first sentence in the article in which you speak of "religious toleration," is objectionable. It is a phrase which is indigenous and belongs exclusively to the Old World, but has no place whatever in the vocabulary of the New. To an American who respects his own convictions of truth, and whose mind is imbued with the spirit of the National Constitution, there is no word in the English language so hateful, and so utterly damnable, as the word "toleration." It implies a State Church established by law, and supported by the unwilling taxation of the people; and that all who conscientiously dissent from it, and support a different religion, or no religion, are graciously and condescendingly tolerated in their non-conformity. Toleration! In the name of heaven who is it in this country, and under our flag, that tolerates, and who are they that are tolerated? The Constitution of the United States not only makes no distinction between the Bible, the Koran, the Zend Avesta, and the Shasta, but ignores the very existence of them all. It requires no judicial oaths, and expressly forbids all religious tests of qualification for holding office. Could a greater insult be offered any man on the sacred soil of the Republic than to say to him that his religious opinions, whether Protestant, Deistic, Jewish, Catholic, Mohammedan, or what not, are tolerated?

It is sorrowful, Mr. Editor, to see the carelessness, and even recklessness, of men in political life in regard to this amendment question concerning the schools. Mr. Blaine's resolution shows, in its very construction, that he never studied the subject involved in it at all; for its defects, as pointed out in the Senate, are manifold and obvious. Neither did the House in adopting it ever intend that it should accomplish the object it purported to attain, because the last sentence, as you remark, made the amendment practically a nullity, by taking from Congress the power to enforce it by proper legislation. The discussion, both in the House and in the Senate, was marked by the entire absence of all statesmanship which understands the causes and effects of things. It was the trickery of mere politicians of both parties to get rid of the apple of discord which Mr. Blaine had thrown among them for party purposes on the eve of a Presidential election. The Democrats, for fear of the Catholics, and the Republicans, for fear of the Protestants, and both, regardless of the genius of the Constitution, shirked the question, leaving out of sight the overwhelming majority of the American people who are neither Catholic nor Protestant, but who love their liberties and are determined to maintain them. It reminds me of the case of Hezekiah, King of Judah, who, when the Lord's prophet told him that for the sin of his own pride, and love of personal aggrandizement, his sons should be eunuchs and slaves in the palace of the King of Babylon, gave utterance to his cowardly and selfish feelings by saying that he did not care, provided he enjoyed peace and quiet during his days.

But, Mr. Editor, this question concerning the schools must be met, and the sooner the better. There is a distemper in the body politic which is very threatening in its appearance. The quackery of the politician will not heal, but make it worse. Only the heroic treatment of the statesman, with the medicine of the Constitution in his hand, can root it out, and restore perfect health. The times need a Congress of honest, patriotic, and courageous men who will redeem the pledge made by the founders of the Republic a century ago, and establish upon this soil forever, not the rights of Americans as such, but the rights of human nature.

I am sorry to see, Col. Forney, that you endorse the Senate's form of amendment without exception. To me it looks like a Trojan horse, and the band of armed Greeks in its belly is the concluding sentence which is in these words: "This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution," etc. Instead of meeting the issue like men and patriots, and stopping the quarrel before it begins, the Senate would roll the responsibility of deciding whether the Bible shall be introduced into the schools or not, on the States, or the school districts in the States, where it is sure to make mischief. For what Bible is meant by this language? Why, our Protestant Bible. But the Catholics will not allow this Bible to come into their houses nor churches at all, because, as they allege, it is an incorrect translation from the original, gotten up in the interests of Protestantism as against the Catholic Church, and teaches damnable heresy. Will you allow it to be forced upon their children at the public schools? The Jews pay school taxes. Will you allow their children to be compelled to listen to the reading of the New Testament writings which condemn their fathers as infidels, and as bloody crucifiers of the Son of God? Have the outsiders who pay school tax, and who are neither Catholics, Protestants, nor Jews, but who are more numerous than all of them put together, and quite as intelligent and respectable, no rights in this matter which are entitled to respect? The Chinese are already among us, and some of them have become naturalized citizens; and the Mohammedans may be here after a while. Will they have no rights in the case under a government established to secure the rights of man as man? After inviting them to our shores in the name of the Constitution, will you meet them when they come, and tell them that they must give up the sacred books in which they have been educated and which they conscientiously believe, and have their children indoctrinated in the public schools with the teachings of our Bible? Will you rival the brazen-facedness of that impudent minority who have brought their European nations to this country, and now proclaim, in the face and teeth of the Constitution, that these citizens and immigrants who cannot accept the Protestant translation of the Bible, and their false interpretations of it, may leave the country, and find homes somewhere else?

You say: "The clause allowing the Bible to be read in the public schools does not specify which version shall be used, but leaves it optional with the State to allow the Protestant, Catholic, or Jewish version to be read by their respective devotees." Just think of it! Three versions of the Bible to be read in the schools, to say nothing of the Mormon Bible in Utah, the Koran of the Moslems who will be here after a while, and whose sacred books are as much versions of our Bible as the Jewish version is. Imagine a teacher calling out in turn all these "devotees," as you style them, to read their religious books in a school supported by public taxation to teach American children reading, writing, arithmetic, and geography, and nothing else! You smile incredulously. But under a Constitution which makes the safety of the citizen to consist in the fact that, as a mere organ of political government, it knows no religion at all, if you allow the sacred books of one religion to be introduced into a school, how are you going to shut the doors against any of the rest?

Should the Senate's form of amendment be adopted by the States, and become a part of the Constitution, the natural and inevitable effect of it would be to convert every State in the Union into a shindy ground, and the Bible itself into a shindy-ball to be struck, kicked, and cuffed about until it will be thoroughly dishonored. Already has bloodshed resulted from zeal on this question. Sullivan in Chicago was a Catholic; Hanford was a Protestant; and the acrimonious feeling which resulted in homicide grew out of this question of the Bible in the public schools. It encourages every Catholic and Protestant, if he have the majority of his neighborhood on his side, to parade himself with a chip on his shoulder daring any one to knock it off at his peril.

Now, if there were no other way for the people of the United States to get a knowledge of the Bible except by hearing in their youth a few verses read every morning in the public schools, the case for many would be altered. But when the land is full of churches, Sunday-schools, and Bible-classes; and when the Bible Society's scattering copies of the Bible by thousands every year so that every house has a copy, it seems to me that, to force this book into the public schools supported by tax-payers of all the different religions, and of none, shows that whoever advocates it is actuated by feelings of sectarian rivalry which all patriotic men ought to frown upon, because it will inevitably repeat the bloody proceedings at Chicago.

There are many enlightened church people in this country, especially among the Episcopalians, who, from profound veneration for the Bible, would take it out of the shiny ground of politics and the schools where it is made the occasion of unholy wranglings, and would keep it in the churches and families where it belongs, and where it may be read and accepted in the character in which it offers itself. But the zealots who wish to Europeanize our Constitution and form of government charge all such people with being infidels, secret or open, who hate the Bible, and therefore wish to keep it out of the schools and politics. The fumes of their zeal cloud their vision so that they cannot see that their policy, if adopted by the people, would wreck our ship of State upon the rocks.

You know, Col. Forney, the value of the maxim, "Obsta principiis"—"resist the beginnings." The framers of the Constitution were governed by this maxim when they declared a complete divorce between the State and the Church, causing all religions to stand on their own merits or demerits before the people, giving neither countenance nor opposition to any. During the administration of Washington the government made a declaratory announcement in its treaty with Tripoli, one of the Barbary Powers, that "in no sense is the government of the United States founded on the Christian religion." In view of this declaration, which has all the force of Constitutional law, how can any member of the Senate or House of Representatives have any difficulty in seeing that even the mention of the Bible, the Koran, or the sacred books of any other religion, is entirely out of place in a State paper like the one we are contemplating, much more the idea of allowing any such book to be introduced into the public schools, and to become a bone of everlasting religious controversy among the people? The Constitution of the United States is a secular instrument from beginning to end, knowing and providing for this present evil world only; and any amendment concerning the schools should partake of this same character. Such a policy would give peace, homogeneity, and fraternity to our people. The opposite policy is the box of Pandora, full of all manner of evils which would fill the country with jealousies, hatreds, and blood.

Mr. Editor, I was sorry to see that during the brief debate in the Senate on this subject, so pregnant with either blessing or disaster to the country, the voice of Pennsylvania was silent. Cameron was away, recuperating from the fatigues of a long session, and Wallace is a mere Democrat, who cares but for his party. When the subject comes up again, may we not hope that, as it was in the chief city of Pennsylvania that our National Constitution was framed by the wisest men who ever lived, the spirit of wisdom and true patriotism that guided them may lead our Representatives in Congress, in this Centennial year, to take a part that becomes Pennsylvanians, in securing an amendment to the Constitution that will secularize the schools of the nation as the Constitution secularizes the government?

There is so much that is excellent and instructive in your very able article, Mr. Editor, that I hate to find fault with it at all. But as no man, probably, sees all the truth on a great and complicated question, like the one on hand, discussion is always in order. Respectfully yours, A. B. BRADFORD.

DR. SLADE'S DEFENCE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I see that you find room for "Dr. Slade Exposed," and have therefore no hesitation in asking you to republish from the London Times "Dr. Slade's Defence," which will take less space.

After long and patient investigation, I am not able to call myself a "Spiritualist"; but the universal disposition of the press to slander them and their "mediums" seems to me quite despicable.

In one instance in this city of New York, I am credibly told that Slade was refused opportunity to reply to one of his "exposers" by a statement of facts even after he offered one hundred dollars for the privilege, and this by more than one of our papers.

Let THE INDEX, at least, deal fairly by these people, who, I am sure, are (mediums included) as honest as their neighbors.

B. NEW YORK, Oct. 7.

HE DENIES ANY IMPOSTURE.—A FLAT CONTRADICTION.—WHAT SERGEANT EDWARD W. COX SAYS.

[From the London Times.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES:—

Sir,—It very seldom occurs that I feel called upon to write in my own defence. To the statements of Prof. Lankester, which appeared in the Times of the 16th Inst., I think I may with propriety reply.

These are the facts: On our sitting down to the table, I held the slate against the under side of the table, when, after some delay, the sound of the pencil writing on the slate was heard. On withdrawing the slate there was found to be what might have been intended for a name very poorly written upon the upper surface. I then wiped this off the slate, saying, "I will hold it again; perhaps they will write plainer." Again a little delay ensued, when I said to Prof. Lankester, "Perhaps if you will take hold of the slate with me they may be better able to write." He thereupon released his hand from where it was joined with my left and those of his friend upon the table, and instead of holding the slate with me, seized it, as he describes.

Instead of there being a message written, as he says, there were only two, or at the most three words on the upper surface of the slate.

Now, had Prof. Lankester listened as closely as he says he watched me, he must have heard me say, after asking him to hold the slate with me, "They are writing now." This was said while he was in the act of removing his hand from where it was joined on the table to the slate, for I heard the sound of the pencil when the writing commenced, while I was asking him to hold the slate with me. Consequently, when he seized the slate, only two or three words were found written upon it.

Had he told me he suspected I was doing the writing, I think there would have been no difficulty in disabusing his mind on that point.

That I do the writing with a piece of pencil under my finger-nail is an old theory. However, I always keep my nails so closely cut as to render that impossible, to which those who have taken the trouble to examine them can testify. Therefore, all I have to say is, I did not do the writing at the sitting with Prof. Lankester, nor at any other sitting given by me during the years I have been before the public as a medium. Very truly yours, HENRY SLADE.

A FAIR VIEW.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES:—

Sir,—Having been twice referred to by your correspondents as one of the witnesses of Dr. Slade's doings, I must ask your permission to state briefly that my visit to him was official, my duty, as President of the Psychological Society of Great Britain, being to report to the society upon whatever alleged psychological phenomena may invite attention.

I certainly witnessed all that your correspondents have described, and have reported faithfully what I saw. But I have carefully abstained from pronouncing any judgment as to genuineness or otherwise. My report concludes thus: "I offer no opinion upon their causes, for I have formed none. If they be genuine, it is impossible to exaggerate their interest and importance. If they be imposture, it is equally important that the trick should be exposed, as trickery can only be, by showing how it is done and doing it."

My experience differs from that of my friend, Prof. R. Lankester, in this: that with me the slate was not placed under the table, but upon it, and the writing appeared upon the side next to the table, my eyes, as well as hand, being upon it from the moment I cleaned it until I lifted it and found the whole side filled with writing from end to end. If written previously it could only be by some sympathetic pencil which becomes visible when the slate is warmed by the hands placed upon it. Chemists will say if such a thing can be, for if it be so it is a complete solution of the mystery. But although the experiments tried by myself might be so explained, for I used the slate provided by Dr. Slade, it will not explain the instances of Dr. Carpenter and many others who have used their own slates; and this should always be required by the visitor.

Experience shows that no judgment can be safely formed of experiments of any kind upon one trial. They must be witnessed under various conditions. The very strangeness of the exhibition should make us slow to come to an opinion whether what is there seen is conjuring or psychological.

I can only repeat what Dr. Carpenter has stated of his own visit,—that I could detect no imposture, nor find any explanation, mechanical or otherwise, either of the writing, the rapping, the floating chairs, or the hands.

But, knowing how a clever conjurer can deceive the eye of a stranger, I should be reluctant to form an opinion until I had seen the exhibition twice or thrice, so as to be enabled to keep the eye steadily upon the exhibitor, and not upon the phenomena,—watching what he is doing instead of observing what is done,—by which process alone can sleight of hand be discovered.

Yours obediently, EDWARD W. COX,
Pres. of the Psychological Society of Great Britain.
CARLTON CLUB, Sept. 18.

AN OPPORTUNITY LOST.

Thoughtful men are rapidly coming to the conclusion that the question of the relation of the public schools to religion ought to be permanently settled, and on a national basis. Left in its present uncertain condition, it is a perpetual irritation. Thus, that which should be an element of unity, and a promoter of homogeneity, is turned into an apple of discord. Protestants and Catholics are in an endless wrangle over it; while Christians make it a battlefield for their conflicts with Jews and Rationalists. It is evident that the real and vital question is, whether we shall maintain our system of common schools, or shall relegate the subject of popular education to private and ecclesiastical control. We cannot be mistaken in affirming the unalterable attachment of the people to the main features of our present system; so far, at least, as provision is made at public expense for the education of all the children of the community in the elementary branches. If there is any doubt anywhere, it is as to embracing in the scheme the higher courses of study, which are for the few rather than for the many, and which more necessarily involve tuition in disputed branches of learning.

On the supposition, then, that the people will insist upon maintaining the public-school system, let us inquire how it is to be made permanent, and to be placed upon a fixed and satisfactory basis. So long as [it is] subject, in any fundamental respect, to ordinary legislation, it will remain, as at present, the sport of changeable caprice, or be like a floating cork on the waves of popular passion. In the absence of uniform legislative prescription for the whole State, every city and county now has its own principle, or want of principle, in adjusting the religious question, with no certainly that the decision will hold good, even there, for more than a year. It would be a great gain could the State Constitution have an article so worded as to establish a definite rule; for it is much more difficult to change the Constitution than it is to alter a statute.

There is reason, also, to believe that, after the people had carried out their schools successfully for several years, under a rigorous provision in the State Constitution, the good results would be so manifest that no proposal of change would meet with favor. But still better would be an article to the same effect in the Federal Constitution; for that would give us a truly national institution; compelling each State to make provision for popular education, without discrimination as to race, or birth, or creed—a duty now greatly neglected at the South,—and securing uniformity of principle throughout the Union. We should then be able to point to an American system. Moreover, such an amendment once adopted could be changed only by a two-thirds vote of each House of Congress, and a subsequent ratification of three-fourths of the States. There would be no doubt of its permanence.

What now must be the essential restrictions in such a constitutional amendment in order to meet the difficulties of our American problem? Precisely two, in our judgment. First, there should be a prohibition of any State-support of sectarian or denominational schools, directly or indirectly. This would strike a death-blow to the hopes of those of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, which insists that the State ought to appropriate funds to support the religious schools of that denomination in proportion to the number of their children. Doubtless they await the looked-for day when they can secure a majority in some of the States favorable to this project. The proposal must be made utterly impracticable in the whole country by a clear prohibition in an educational amendment to the Federal Constitution. Then, secondly, to balance this, as a matter of justice to all concerned, and to match the existing constitutional prohibition of any "establishment of religion," there should be a requirement that all schools supported by public tax or appropriations should be strictly secular, allowing no religious worship or instruction. Then our American principle of non-intervention by the State in religious questions would have complete application to school as well as to church, and the members of the Church of Rome would see that, while refusing to sustain Roman Catholic schools, we were not inconsistently supporting those of another religious character.

And now what prevents the adoption of such a comprehensive and wise measure? Simply the fanatical determination of certain zealous religionists, who would rather not defeat the Roman Catholic scheme than to have their own also precluded. Those who bitterly denounce the Roman Catholics for their objections to common schools, conducted on Protestant principles, will virtually join hands with them in defeating a constitutional amendment which would forever render it impossible to appropriate public funds to the support of sectarian and thus of Romish schools. The evidence of this appears in the recent action of the United States Senate on such an amendment, which had been recommended by the President, had been introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. Blaine, and had been adopted by that body unanimously, with the exception of two or three negative votes. With such a start as this, everything appeared hopeful; for if the Senate should, with a similar unanimity, coincide, there could be no doubt that three-quarters of the States would ratify it. There seemed at last to be a prospect of a permanent settlement of this vexed question. But it is unsafe to count upon anything until it is actually done. Human nature, even in well-meaning men, is very uncertain. And so it happened that when the amendment reached the Senate a diligent tinkering began in committee, and finally it was so altered that its father would not have known it, to make it stronger here and weaker there. A slight change of phraseology to make the prohibition of aid to sectarian schools still more sure might have been well, as it would have caused little delay if adopted. But the entire recasting of the amendment and the adding of numerous clauses, and especially of one excluding from the scope of the amendment the reading of the Bible in the schools, were fatal to success, as must have been foreseen. A two-thirds vote of the Senate could not be secured for the amendment of the amendment; and so the golden opportunity was lost. If we were given to Scriptural analogies we might say that it was another instance in which Pilate and Herod became friends by striking hands in opposition to good. The original amendment, as it came from the House, met the combined opposition of the Roman Catholic and of the Protestant Bible-in-school party; and the latter changed it so as to turn an anti-Catholic triumph into a defeat. Let us hear no more from them after this dog-in-the-manger policy of their anxiety to keep the Roman Catholics from gaining their end. The grandest opportunity of our history to accomplish this very thing was offered to them, and was rejected, unless consent should be given at the same time to make the constitutional amendment self-contradictory by so phrasing it as, first, to forbid the support of Roman Catholic schools, and then to allow the support of Protestant or Bible-reading schools.—Chicago Tribune, Sept. 17.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCTOBER 19, 1876.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. Toledo Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

REMOVAL.

On and after October 1, 1876, the publication office of THE INDEX will be No. 231 Washington Street, Boston. Office hours will be from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M.

A LADY writes from Philadelphia, ordering some extra copies of THE INDEX of October 5: "If you keep publishing such good campaign documents as Mr. Frothingham's 'Proving and Holding Fast' and 'The New Faith,' I fear I shall spend most of my loose change in buying and disseminating them."

THERE ARE persons so dull or so malicious as to hold us personally responsible for what our contributors say. It ought to be superfluous to repeat that whoever writes in THE INDEX stands sponsor for his own opinions or statements of fact, and for these alone. The editor assumes no responsibility for contributed writings which is not imposed on every editor by the laws of the land.

MRS. BESANT's letter this week gives an exceedingly interesting narrative of a second attempt to prevent her from lecturing at Hoxley. Every respectable Christian must be ashamed of a defence of his own cause by such means. Mr. Conway has described in the Cincinnati Commercial a previous attempt of the same sort, with eulogies upon Mrs. Besant's courage in the midst of what he well calls the "Bashi-Bazouks of Yorkshire."

THE LETTER of Mr. L. S. Tyler to the New York Tribune, published in our last week's issue, has been pronounced a forgery. It is manifestly impossible to discover the truth about the connection of Governor Hayes with the American Alliance. Too many persons, on one side or the other, are attempting to deceive the public. The New York Telegram calls upon the Governor to declare the truth himself; but it is unlikely that he will speak on the subject.

A SUBSCRIBER writes thus from Chimney Hollow, Colorado: "Alone, far back in the Rocky Mountains, herding cattle, where I seldom see any person, reading THE INDEX and some other papers, some eighteen miles from any post-office, indulging in my own meditations as profoundly, perhaps, as Volney did among his old ruins, feeling a desire to acquire knowledge and a desire to communicate it to others, I enclose a pitiful mite for a few copies of the 'Patriotic Address.'" They were sent, with many kind wishes to the lonely reader.

THE SIX lectures and addresses of Professor Huxley in this country, including his Buffalo, Nashville, and Baltimore addresses, and his course of lectures on Evolution at New York, are published all together by the New York Tribune in a neat pamphlet, "Extra, No. 36," for twenty-five cents. The wide-spread interest excited by these lectures, and the replies to them with which the pulpit and press are teeming, render it a very timely publication, which many of our readers would especially value. It must be ordered from the Tribune itself, not from THE INDEX.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

THE SITUATION.

The political situation is a most perplexing and embarrassing one to all who believe, as we do most emphatically, in the sacredness of individual human rights and in the paramount obligation of government to protect them. The question of the national finances is at bottom a question of the property rights of individuals, creditors and debtors alike; and financial honesty itself is nothing but practical respect for these property rights. Civil service reform is demanded by all good citizens because it is an indispensable condition of administering the entire government so as to secure protection for all the rights of all the people. The Southern question is at bottom a question of the protection of the individual rights of the people at the South, negroes just as much as whites, and whites just as much as negroes; and to-day it is the negroes that need this protection most. Every day, in our opinion, it becomes clearer that, if a "white man's party" is hereafter to control the national government or the State governments, the monstrous iniquity of such a policy will entail monstrous injustice to the negroes and equally monstrous disasters to the whole country. And the State Secularization question is at bottom nothing but a question of the protection of individual religious rights, whether of the orthodox or of the heterodox. All these questions turn on fundamental human rights, and the duty of society to defend them impartially; and whoever disregards considerations of human rights in his zeal to establish an honest financial policy or to reform the civil service shows how defective is his comprehension, and how shallow his analysis, of the very reforms he desires to accomplish.

Now we hold that the rights of life and liberty are even more sacred than property rights, and tower above the latter in their claim to protection. If they are endangered, they must be protected first of all. There is no use in splitting hairs over "State rights" and "Constitutional limitations"; the United States are a nation, and it is every nation's duty to protect above all things the lives and liberties of all its citizens. No matter if the citizen is a poor, ignorant black man on a Southern plantation: the United States must be his defence in the last resort against all violations of his right to life and liberty. If the Constitution does not warrant any interference with State governments for this purpose, then it must be changed; for a nation which recognizes no obligation to protect the lives and liberties of all its citizens is no nation at all, and must perish from the earth. We care not a straw for the legal technicalities which are brought, or may be brought, against this conclusion; we insist that human rights, and above all the rights of the person, are the very things that government exists to protect, and any and all laws should be swept out of existence which stand in the way of this protection. We insist on the absolute equality of all human beings, white or black, rich or poor, young or old, orthodox or heterodox, with respect to these fundamental rights of life and liberty; and we insist on the absolute necessity of the national government (no matter through what forms or by what means, provided they be only efficient) acknowledging and performing its duty to protect the rights for which it was instituted and alone exists.

With these convictions, who is not perplexed at the present condition of our national politics? The Democrats give every indication, as we see things, of being a "white man's party" still, so far as the South is concerned; its contempt for the human rights of the negro seems as cruel and infamous as ever. Further, its attitude on the financial and the civil service questions seems to be thoroughly tricky and insincere, and to justify the worst anguishes of its probable action on those points, if placed in national control; while, as to State Secularization, its past record interprets its present studied silence as indicating a ruinous subservience to Roman Catholic schemes. On the other hand, the Republican party is now what it was in the beginning, a party pledged to the protection of black as well as white citizens, and so far entitled to the support of every true patriot. On the financial question, it is somewhat divided and wavering, yet probably will act at least in the direction of a restoration of honest money; on the civil service question, it appears just as tricky and insincere as the Democratic party; while, as to State Secularization, it ominously threatens the country with action on behalf of Protestant Orthodoxy which will plunge it, for a century perhaps, into a religious strife of yearly increasing bitterness, to end no man can tell how.

Such is the situation as we see it. If we confess ourselves hopelessly perplexed by it, and consciously unable to advise any one to vote for either of the two great parties which divide between them all the possibilities of success next month, we have done all that honesty permits. The "choice of evils" policy is open to all who approve it; we do not. If we did, we should vote the Republican ticket. But we cannot bring ourselves to vote for a positive wrong on the plea that some other wrong is still worse. This is woefully "unpractical," perhaps, as so many are swift to declare. But we can only give our personal testimony on behalf of equal individual rights for all, whether white or black, male or female, Christian or non-Christian, and to declare our conviction that property rights are not so sacred as those of life and liberty, and the rights of life and outward liberty not so sacred as those of conscience and soul-freedom. That is why we think the State Secularization question of such overshadowing importance even at this early stage of the great impending struggle on that issue; it is not because we do not appreciate the vast consequence of the other interests at stake, but because we see that in the long run all other interests must depend on the protection of the equal religious liberty of all the citizens. The peril to the secular character of the National Constitution, on which all religious liberty here depends, is so subtle and reconceals as not to be visible to the over-confident and careless people; yet it is real and imminent. It now looks as if the mischief would be actually accomplished before the people are at all aroused to its nature, and as if nothing but a long tuition in the bitter school of experience would ever teach them what a priceless jewel they are now carelessly letting slip from their grasp. It is easy to call this cheerfully or impatiently the "hobby" of THE INDEX, and pass to other thoughts; but inappreciation changes no facts and protects from no evils. In the confusion of issues which marks the present Presidential campaign, it is our own duty to point out steadily and faithfully this issue which others overlook, and then to wait quietly for the revelations of events.

JUSTICE, NOT PARTISANSHIP.

I cannot let a day pass without making at least a brief protest against some statements by "R. C." on the Southern question in the last INDEX. He says, in reference to the condition of South Carolina, that "we have presented to-day the curious paradox that every well-wisher of the negro must desire the success at the coming election of the rebel General Wade Hampton and the defeat of Chamberlain, notwithstanding the latter's excellent purposes and his attempts at genuine reform." I happen to know a good many "well-wishers of the negro," sincere, long-tried, and wise, who certainly have no such desire, but deprecate the success of Hampton and his party as a dire misfortune to the negro.

He speaks of "the rule of the negro and his fellow-scalawag, the carpet-bag white man." This is unjust to a good many white men whom, with the old Southerner, it indiscriminately styles carpet-baggers; but it is more unjust to the negroes, whom, as a whole, it classes as "scalawags." Of course the writer does not mean this, but it is a piece of carelessness in writing that becomes of the nature of a crime. It is the same exasperating injustice that is committed by many of the Democratic newspapers in South Carolina, that habitually speak of the Legislature as a "gang of thieves." Such language helps to deepen the color-line, and works mischief.

He says that the Southern negroes have proved themselves "utterly incapable of self-government," and that peace and order can only be assured "when the intelligent portion of the community—that is, the white race—make and administer the laws." And he points to South Carolina for illustration. Last winter and spring I had some opportunity for studying the political problem in that State, and it is my opinion that there, in spite of all the exceptional and difficult conditions of the experiment, and the disaster and disgrace that have in some respects attended it, negro-suffrage and negro-government have proved a hopeful success. The proof is in the facts that each succeeding Legislature has been an improvement on its predecessor in intelligence and morality, and that the ruling party has been gradually sloughing off and rising out of the very evils that were the natural consequence of its sudden rise to power. I think my friend on further reflection will agree with me that what the South wants to insure peace and prosperity is, not government by either race as such (there is a large section of the white race more ignorant and degraded than the negro), but government in which the races shall learn to work amicably together, and the rights of all classes shall be equally guaranteed and respected. More education and virtue by all means; but they are needed in the South by millions of whites as well as blacks.

A CIRCULAR.

The Secretary of the National Liberal League makes the following announcement to the liberal public:—

OFFICE OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, {
231 Washington St., Boston, Oct. 16, 1876. }

To the numerous liberals who desire to do something to aid the Liberal League movement, but who, on account of isolation from others of like spirit, find it impossible to form a local organization, I would say that the best possible aid at present can be rendered by becoming at once members of the National Liberal League. Having the names and addresses of all strongly interested liberals enrolled on the Secretary's book, it would be easy to communicate with the true friends of the movement in all parts of the country; and the fact of having such an enrolment would give to the movement a greatly increased influence with the general public.

Previous to the National organization, the Local Leagues frequently desired to circulate printed matter in the shape of tracts, petitions, etc.; but, because no adequate means for such circulation existed, much less was accomplished, as can readily be understood, than could have been accomplished, had there been a large list of the friends of State Secularization in existence.

Let every person favoring religious equality for all before the law join either a local or the National organization, or (better still) both, and the Liberal League will soon be a great power for good.

Since it is assumed that each member is willing to give to the cause a little of the necessary pecuniary aid, a fee of one dollar for annual membership, or twenty-five dollars for life membership, is required by the Constitution. Upon application with fee enclosed, together with name and full post-office address of the applicant, the Secretary is now prepared to forward at once certificates of membership, either life or annual, as may be desired.

Let us all "stand and be counted."

R. H. RANNEY,
Sec'y N. L. L.

The certificates of membership will all be authenticated with the beautiful new seal of the National Liberal League, embossed on gilt with a surrounding circle of scarlet. It represents a spirited group—a Catholic Bishop with crozier and mitre, and a Protestant clergyman in his robe, striving to wrest the scales of justice from the hand of Columbia, who, draped in the national flag (which is torn by the rude grasp of one of the assailants), holds the emblem of equal rights out of their reach. In the background, the National Capitol and a Protestant meeting-house stand at opposite corners, to typify the separation of Church and State. This group is encircled with the legend, "National Liberal League: July 4th, 1876"; and the whole seal eloquently speaks to the eye the great central idea of the Liberal League movement.

While the publication of the "Patriotic Address" and the Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals (which has involved an enormous amount of labor and been most vexatiously delayed), together with the drafting, debating, and printing of numerous papers, have been in progress, no special efforts have been made to increase the individual membership of the National League. But several persons have indicated their strong sympathy with the movement by making themselves members without delay. Besides the one hundred and seventy charter-members (a complete alphabetical list of whom will be published in the forthcoming Report of the Centennial Congress), the following persons have become Life Members of the National Liberal League:—

JACOB HOFFNER,.....Cincinnati, O.
DAVID FERGUSON,.....Wapuna, Wis.
E. P. HURLBUT,.....Albany, N. Y.
CHAS. A. GURLEY,.....Pulaski, N. Y.
MRS. KATE F. ABBOT,.....Cambridge, Mass.

The following also have made themselves Annual Members of the National Liberal League:—

IVAN PANIN,.....Boston, Mass.
FRANK BACON,....." "
EMERSON BENTLEY,.....Morgan City, La.
F. A. ANGELL,.....Passaic City, N. J.
B. DOSCHER,.....Charleston, S. C.
T. W. HIGGINSON,.....Newport, R. I.
JOHN G. JENKINS,.....Denver, Col.
F. S. NEWELL,.....Boston, Mass.
S. T. STOREY,....." "
MRS. ELLA J. ST. JOHN,.....Elkhart, Ind.
JOHN C. GRIERSON,.....Jacksonville, Ill.
GILBERT BILLINGS,.....Chicopee, Mass.
JOHN M. ARNOLD,.....South Boston, Mass.

All these will probably have received their certificates of membership before this reaches the reader; if not, we desire to be informed. And we hope that now both lists will be speedily increased. A report of new members will be made from time to time in THE INDEX; and any one whose name is not reported in the list next succeeding his application should notify us by letter.

It may be well to state that the certificate of membership in the Centennial Congress of Liberals, except for those who were actually present, does not give membership in the National Liberal League,—the General Centennial Committee, of course, having had no authority to confer it. As there were nearly eight hundred persons who signed the application for membership in the Congress, of whom only one hundred and seventy could be present, it is hoped that the remainder will now at once join the National Liberal League.

IN MEMORIAM.

THE INDEX has already announced the death of Benjamin Rodman, of New Bedford, and spoken of his interest in the principles it represents. But of a character so marked and faithful as was his, something more may well be said. Though considerably past seventy years when the Free Religious Association was organized, he welcomed it with the ardor of youth. He was an earnest friend and advocate of free religion long before the phrase began to be spelled with capitals or the free religious movement took any general organic shape. Each year until the present, when ill-health prevented, he has taken special pains to purchase for free distribution a considerable number of the Annual Reports of the Association. The same thing he was accustomed to do with other liberal books and pamphlets that attracted his attention. Many persons are indebted to him for such publications, without, perhaps, in all cases knowing from whom they came. A book that specially pleased him in these latter years was General Hitchcock's Christ the Spirit. Reading this book for the first time some three years ago, from a copy loaned him by a friend, and finding that it was out of print in the market, he secured a new edition by agreeing with the publisher to pay a portion of the cost.

He was little of a mystic himself, yet this mystical book attracted him, probably because of its affinity with his Quaker doctrine of the Inner Light, to which he gave a very large and liberal interpretation. For Mr. Rodman was born and bred a Quaker, and, though for many years he had not been identified with the Society of Friends, he was very fond of tracing his theological ancestry to George Fox. Fox was one of his heroes whom he never ceased to admire and never outgrew. In the great division that took place among the Quakers in this country fifty years ago, he and other members of his family warmly espoused the liberal side, maintaining that this was true Quakerism. But they were outnumbered by the Orthodox in the New Bedford meeting and were disowned. To one of this group of freethinking Quakers—Mary Rotch, a woman of great strength of intelligence and character,—I heard Ralph Waldo Emerson, a few weeks since, express his own large personal indebtedness for mental stimulus. In his pulpit-days Mr. Emerson spent considerable time in New Bedford, preaching in the Unitarian Church there, and was often a guest at her house. Previous to this time most of these liberal Quakers had connected themselves with the Unitarian Society, at the advent of Rev. Orville Dewey as its minister, in 1823. Mr. Rodman was one of this number, and ever afterward was counted a member of the latter society,—popularly called Unitarian, but legally entitled "First Congregational"; but none the less did he consider himself a good Quaker, after the order of Fox and Penn. It was one of his common sayings that "the whole world is turning Quaker." Neither by temperament nor conviction could he be a denominational man. His religious sympathies were too broad, his demand for liberty of thought too thorough for that. To the last he retained his interest in new fields of inquiry. Seldom do we find men keeping so much of their youthful enthusiasm for ideas through maturity and into old age.

Mr. Rodman had a vigorous and athletic nature, physically and mentally. He was as vigorous in expression as he was intense in conviction, and often became impassioned and boisterous in speech. He could dislike with as much fervor as he liked, and was in danger of not doing full justice to an opponent. There was with him no concealing of opinions for the sake of suavity of social intercourse. But this plain and sometimes bitter speaking had its root in the utter sincerity and robustness of his moral nature, which could brook no flattery nor shams. He was no diplomat. Yet he was respected for thorough honesty, for his uprightness and downrightness in all his business affairs as in matters of opinion. In his earlier years, becoming embarrassed in business, he went to prison at the instance of an importunate creditor, though plenty of friends offered the financial help requisite to prevent it. But he took the ground that the law, as it then was in Massachusetts, was very unjust, since the rich man, with numerous friends of wealth and social position, could easily escape imprisonment for debt, while the poor man, having no such relief, would be thrown into jail; and so he resolutely refused the proffered aid and took his place in the debtor's cell. While there he wrote a pamphlet entitled "A Voice from Prison," on the subject of the law concerning debt, which helped to awaken public sentiment on the matter and was instrumental in securing better legislation. At one time he was a State Senator, and at another a member of the Governor's Council.

With all his plainness and bluntness of speech, his sympathies were quick, and he was genuinely benevolent. There was no stint in his giving for the objects in which he believed. It was a pleasure to go to him to solicit aid for any such object,—or rather to suggest, for solicitation was not necessary. In such cases there were no excuses to hold back his ready hand. To the poor and unfortunate he was a staunch friend. Not many knew how much he was doing to befriend the needy. Only by accident did his family discover many of his generousities. His extensive and pleasant grounds, once quite out of town, had become nearly surrounded by a factory village and the dwellings of the poorer class of people. Yet no gate barred free access to them. Poor, worn women came to sit under the shade of his trees and enjoy his flowers and fruits, and children played upon his lawns. He had let it be understood, without any public notice, that children were especially welcome there on Sunday, and I have seen flocks of them there from the neighboring tenement houses on a pleasant Sunday afternoon, behaving with perfect propriety, yet freely enjoying themselves. Once on directing my attention to them he called them his Sunday-school; and sometimes he would go out and talk with them. The following anecdote of his benevolence has recently come to my knowledge; an Orthodox gentleman was inquiring of one who knew him better, what were Mr. Rodman's religious views, and looked grieved and sober on hearing the answer, as if for one holding such views there could be little hope in respect to the future world. An old Scotch weaver, who was standing by and heard the conversation, thereupon broke in: "I don't know where Mr. Rodman went to church nor what he believed; but I know that between 1861 and 1865 there were a half-dozen good milk cows in his barn, and that the great bulk of their milk was distributed among the poor; and I would rather have that as a passport to heaven than all the creeds."

For several years our friend has led a retired and quiet life, enjoying his rural home and his favorite books, and the correspondence still kept up with old friends; and thus with cheerful serenity he has awaited the great change, which now, after nearly eighty-two years of brave living, has quietly and beautifully come to him.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY H. C.

A great deal of the political talk of the week has of course referred more or less directly to the result of the elections in Ohio and Indiana. Most politicians hoped that the result in these States would prove the existence of a very decided change of public sentiment in favor of one or the other of the two great parties; and the actual result—a small majority for the Democrats in Indiana, and a small majority for the Republicans in Ohio—is, therefore, satisfactory to neither party, as it goes to show that if many people have lost confidence in the Republican party, they have not transferred that confidence to the Democratic party. It leaves, also, the ultimate result in November still in doubt, and gives promise of one of the closest contests of the present generation.

With reference to the ultimate result of the contest, we venture to present the following calculation of probabilities, which, if not correct, has at least been carefully made, and is not affected by any known political bias. As States reasonably certain to vote for Hayes, we set down Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Vermont, Wisconsin, Rhode Island, and Colorado; these cast 154 electoral votes. As States equally certain to vote for Tilden, we put down Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Missouri, Mississippi, Nevada, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia; these cast 146 electoral votes. Of States which, whatever the probabilities with regard to them, may yet be claimed as doubtful, we can name only New York (35 votes), New Jersey (9 votes), South Carolina (7 votes), Indiana (15 votes), and Oregon (3 votes); and of these Oregon and New Jersey are conceded to Tilden by the National Republican Committee, and it is hardly possible that Indiana will reverse in November her last week's choice. Now, remembering that there are 369 electoral votes in all, 185 being necessary for a choice, it is evident, if the above division be correct, that Tilden can be elected only by carrying New York and one at least of the three States, New Jersey, Indiana, South Carolina; and that he will carry one of these three, at least, is decidedly probable. On the other hand, although Hayes might be elected without New York, this result could be reached only by his success in New Jersey, Indiana, and South Carolina, and that he will carry these three is not very probable. The ultimate result, therefore, seems to depend entirely upon the vote of New York, which is claimed with equal earnestness by both parties, with the probabilities, in our opinion, decidedly in favor of Tilden. The above calculation, let it be understood, is based upon appearances to-day; it is not that which we should have presented three weeks ago, and may require to be changed, therefore, before the November election.

The Democrats of Massachusetts have decided that the Republicans shall not reap all the glory of bad nominations, those of the eleventh district having last week nominated Mr. Chester W. Chapin for Congress. Mr. Chapin is President of the Boston & Albany Railroad, and some of our readers will remember him as one to whom we referred several times some months ago when speaking of the sharp practices connected with the Ware River Railroad. We then expressed an opinion—which, by the way, we have since met with no good reason to change—that a proper sense of honor on the part of Mr. Chapin or his most influential supporters would result in his immediate resignation as a member of Congress. Mr. Chapin's record in Congress has not been a brilliant one, and his Ware River affair proves that he is one of the men who, if the Democrats should obtain control, would be mixed up in all future Credit Mobilier and kindred enterprises. We trust sincerely that all Democratic papers which have exhibited righteous indignation at the spectacle of Blaine's railroad doings will not forget that Mr. Chapin is a man who deserves to receive similar attention.

The South Carolina Democrats are determined to elect Wade Hampton at all hazards, and they have our best wishes for their success, although some of their methods of gaining votes are unquestionably dishonorable, and are paralleled only by the action of the national administration toward its employees. They are giving the negro to understand that future employment and consequent bread and butter will depend upon the transfer of the negro's allegiance to the Democratic party. Democratic butchers, and bakers, and candlestick-makers are advertising their wares in the South Carolina newspapers, and it is evident that all white Republicans are to be put, if they are not already, under a social ban. We have no desire to attempt to justify these proceedings, but pious Republicans who are grieved at their appearance must have forgotten that human nature is not angelic nature, and that ten years of subjection to ignorant negroes would not be likely to develop the purest methods of political action.

This last fact seems to have been forgotten by Mr. William Lloyd Garrison, who writes to the Boston Journal a long letter full of praise of Governor Chamberlain, to whom the letter is addressed, and overflowing with the rhetorical platitudes with which the speeches of the old anti-slavery agitators were wont to abound. Mr. Garrison suggests no plan of alleviation of the miseries under which South Carolina has so long suffered, and hardly, in fact, recognizes their existence. The letter shows that its author has learned nothing from the political events which have taken place since the war, and that his work as a reformer was really finished at the time of his retirement from the Anti-Slavery Society.

Mr. Wendell Phillips is another gentleman whose expressions are beginning to be interesting because of their fantastic resemblance to genuine satire, carried to such an extent at times, that, apart from their connection, it would be easy to mistake them as intentionally sarcastic. Thus, last Thursday evening, in Boston, in the course of a lyceum lecture having the peculiar and incomprehensible title of "The Holy Alliance—Rum and the South," he stated that among the "real observers and helpers in the present crisis" were Blaine and Boutwell, Morton and Butler; and among the real impediments were "Charles Francis Adams, the Boston press, and the civil-service reformers."

The Rev. Dr. Talmage, a sensational preacher of Brooklyn, with many attributes of the clerical mountebank, has been guilty of a precious bit of rascality, reported, first, we believe, in the New York World. Talmage was editor of the Christian at Work, and under contract to give to the publishers of the paper thirty days' notice of any intention to retire from its management. Bearing in mind that his publishers had received no intimation of any intention to retire, the Boston Journal thus reports Talmage's neat little game of last week: "The paper was duly made up on Monday and ready for the press. The Doctor came to the office late in the evening, when the publisher and clerks had all gone home, and required the foreman to take out an editorial and insert in its place, 'Good by, old friends,' announcing his retirement and future connection with the Chicago Advance. At the same time he placed on the last page a flaming advertisement of the Advance. He went to the printers and ordered them to commence printing and work all night, a thing unprecedented." During the course of the following day the publishers discovered what had been done; the edition was suppressed, and a new edition prepared and sent to the subscribers some twelve hours or more behind time. We are acquainted with some people, who, when they receive information of this pious trick, will be likely to ask the following questions: (1) Will the Chicago Advance continue to employ a man who is capable of the above-described act? and (2) will the Baptist denomination, to which the reverend harlequin belongs, allow him to remain in full fellowship as a representative of its theology and morality?

Another clerical mountebank, the Rev. Henry Morgan, of Boston, in a Sunday discourse upon "Samson," whom he considered as typical of Butler, furnishes the following paraphrase of a passage of Scripture, which we quote without comment: "And there was a great gathering in the Seventh District, and they said, 'Send for Benjamin that he may make us sport.' And when Benjamin appeared all the Pharisees and Sadducees, the Seers and Sight-seers did laugh and shout, for they said, 'Now we shall have sport!' And Benjamin came and spake funnily to them, and told them that he was eminently fitted to represent them in the councils of the nation, and furthermore that he was no coy maiden, but like unto a widow that knoweth what she wanted. And the saying furnished sport to Benjamin's enemies ever after."

Quite a remarkable auction sale took place the other day in Boston—that of a small old psalm-book, known as the Bay Psalm Book. The book was printed in Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1640, and was the first book printed in America. It was originally the property of the Rev. Richard Mather, grandfather of the famous Cotton Mather, and was given by the latter to his friend, the Rev. Thomas Prince. Prince bequeathed it, together with the rest of his library, to the Old South Church. Some of the deacons of the Old South exchanged it for some antique books belonging to Dr. Shurtleff, but after his death endeavored to regain possession of it, on the ground, we believe, that they had no right to give the book away, and had only loaned it to Dr. Shurtleff. A suit brought for the recovery of the book by the Old South was decided recently, by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in favor of Shurtleff's heirs, by whom the book has just been sold. The first bid was $100, the next $500, and the last $1025, at which sum the book was purchased by Mr. S. S. Ryder, a Providence bookseller.

The affairs of Serbia and Turkey have made but little progress toward a peaceful settlement during the week. The Porte is quite willing to accept a five or six months' armistice, upon certain conditions. These conditions, it is reported, are acceptable to nearly all the powers, with the very important exception of Russia. No battle of importance has taken place, and, with regard to the future, speculation is almost useless.

ENGLISH SKETCHES.

BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT.

LONDON, Oct. 1, 1876.

As I have often spoken of our propagandist labors, it may interest American friends to hear somewhat of the rougher side of our work,—a side not yet quite unknown among us, although more seldom seen than it was some years ago. Some few weeks since, at a colliery village named Hoyland, I met with a very rough crowd, who, led and directed by a primitive Methodist minister, named Hebblethwaite, and two very low Irish Orangemen, endeavored to stop my lecture (an effort in which they failed, for I delivered it in spite of them), and mobbed me afterwards. At the beginning of the present week, our President and myself "fell among thieves." At a very tory and religious town, the Town Hall had been refused to secularist lecturers by the tory Mayor and Corporation, and no other hall was to be had. Congleton seemed a shut door, and we made up our minds to see if it could not be opened. So some good friends there, Mr. and Mrs. Elmy, looking about for a place where lecturing would be possible, found a large upper room in an old mill, capable of holding about six hundred persons. This they engaged, and printed and posted bills which announced that, being refused the use of the Town Hall, the Progressive Club had taken this room for the delivery of two lectures by Mr. Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant. We accordingly went down on Monday last, and took up our abode with the Elmys, thinking no evil. Mr. Bradlaugh was to lecture on the Monday night, and we quietly strolled down to the room—distant about a mile and a half,—and were surprised, on our arrival there, to be greeted with hooting and shouts. It was the beginning of sorrows! The room was crowded. An extempore platform had been fitted up, on which Mr. Bradlaugh and the chairman, Benjamin Elmy, took their places, Mrs. Elmy and myself being seated on one of the front benches. A child was brought to be named, and this was done in perfect quiet. The chairman made a short speech, and then Mr. Bradlaugh commenced his lecture. Very soon it became apparent that preparations had been made for preventing its delivery. A number inside were noisy, and outside a tremendous din commenced. Hooting, shouting, whistling, howling, made an indescribable uproar, and as the lecturer quietly went on, dominating the noise outside by his powerful voice, and by reproach and threat reducing the inside disturbers to meekness, the attack became more vicious. Stones came in at the windows, scattering the shivered glass in every direction, and one rather heavy missile, flung from inside the room, struck me somewhat hard on the head. Spite of all, the lecture was delivered, and an hour's discussion took place. But when Mr. and Mrs. Elmy, Mr. Bradlaugh and myself, issued into the street, we found a pleasant spectacle,—a large crowd, clearly bent on mischief, who, having failed to prevent the lecture, were determined to mob the lecturers. For that long mile and a half they followed us, swearing, cursing, with intervals of Sankey's "Safe in the arms of Jesus," the chorus being emphasized by occasional showers of mud. Mr. Bradlaugh occasionally turned and drove them back, but they always returned, running away like the cowards they were when he faced them, but coming forward again as we walked on. Not for one half-minute did the din cease, and when we reached the house they surrounded it until midnight in the same fashion. A tory county magistrate living opposite came out and stood at his gate, without making any effort to check the uproar, and the magistrate's clerk urged the children on. The tory policeman was similarly inactive, and Mr. Bradlaugh has reported his conduct to the Home Secretary.

The following night things were even worse. The lecture began at eight in the evening, and the crowd outside the Elmys' began to gather two hours previously. This time we drove down, to avoid the long walk, and, as we started, we were saluted with a shower of stones, some too heavy to be pleasant. At the entrance to the room the crowd was dense and uproarious, and inside it was soon seen that an organized attempt to break the meeting was to be made. Eight men came in, soon after the lecture commenced, one of whom was a man named Burbury, who is spoken of in a Manchester paper as a well-known wrestler, and who has many cups won at athletic contests. I went on with my lecture for some time in very fair order, the interruption being slight and easily checked, till some one shouted, "Turn her out," the apparent signal for the row. Mr. Bradlaugh, who was in the chair, intimated that any one who refused to be quiet would have to go out, and instantly this man Burbury jumped up and challenged Mr. Bradlaugh to put him out. Mr. Bradlaugh quietly answered that he had not addressed him, but that he must be quiet or else go. Mr. Burbury defied him, and Mr. Bradlaugh stepped from the platform, Mr. Burbury flinging himself on him. It was clear in a moment that he was a practised wrestler, as he endeavored to throw his antagonist. Mr. Bradlaugh preferred, however, to go down on the top of him, and, as their champion fell underneath, there was a general rush. Christians are chivalrous, and it was one against many. One big fellow was aiming a blow at Mr. Bradlaugh as Burbury was wrestling with him, but this was stopped by the only blow our President struck, full on the man's breast, knocking him back, and he then, through the crowd, pushed Burbury on. Three times the two men went down, Mr. Bradlaugh each time simply kneeling on his antagonist, as lightly as he could the two first times, heavily the third, as Burbury essayed kicking, and after that the champion wrestler was very meek. Mr. Bradlaugh handed him over to the police, returned to the platform, ordered the people to be quiet and sit down, and the lecturer to finish her lecture. This I accordingly did, and there was no more disturbance. We had a short and very orderly discussion, and the meeting then broke up. The crowd was again outside, and behaving in its Christian way, and most unfortunately one of the flints struck Mrs. Elmy just over the eye, raising a large bruise. The remainder rattled harmlessly against the cab. The hooting crowd at Mr. Elmy's was lively as ever, and, tired of the uproar, Mr. Elmy and Mr. Bradlaugh went out with a horsewhip and scattered them in every direction, at last reducing them to yells in the far distance.

I had not imagined it possible that, even among Christians, so brutal and generally offensive a mob could be gathered against infidels. The only satisfaction in the affair was our complete success in pulling through the two lectures and discussions as announced. The more decent Christians of Congleton of course disavow that they had anything to do with the disturbance; but they are really responsible for it. In the first place the ignorant among the people only tried to stop the lectures, and they did, after their fashion, just what the Mayor and Corporation did in theirs; the spirit is identical. Then the mob (consisting chiefly of young lads and girls from fourteen to twenty years of age) was organized and directed, and we heard afterwards of the instructions they had received. One man, a Methodist leader, was identified as one of the mud-throwers by a woman to whom he was known. Christians make a fatal mistake in imagining that weapons of this description really serve their cause. They only disgrace it, and disgust decent people. The day has gone by for the use of violence. Of old, when the Church was strong, she ruled by such means, and the nations crouched under her rod; now, she only makes herself ridiculous by such proceedings, although it is instructive to note that the power, not the will, is wanting to exercise the old cruelty.

Communications.

"FANATICISM OF UNBELIEF."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The Tribune heads with the title, "The Fanaticism of Unbelief," an editorial censuring Mr. Conway for having, as it says, reported at second-hand concerning Miss Harriet Martineau—"that, being questioned on her death-bed as to her belief in immortality, she answered by a blunt and epigrammatic disavowal of any such expectation for herself." Mr. Conway's communication, which is to the Cincinnati Commercial, is given in the last INDEX, from which it appears that Miss Martineau's answer was: "I have no reason to believe in another world. I have had enough of life in one, and can see no good reason why Harriet Martineau should be perpetuated."

If what was uttered by Miss Martineau was unreasonable, the statement of it was not improper on that account, though it should afford to some person opportunity to show it to be so. At the worst, it could only show that sensible people may fall into vagaries as well as say sensible things. If, in reporting it, Mr. Conway had affected great horror at what the Tribune considers the absurdity or the impropriety of it, then it might have been all right. But what claim has the Tribune to enjoin upon the rest of the world the same appreciation which it chooses to entertain of the value of a prejudice, of the truth or falsity of which no possible evidence can be given? Rather should it be considered that the habit of asserting that to be true which cannot be proved to be so, tends to subservience, untruthfulness, and general demoralization, and that the acceptance of dogmas prescribed without proof leads to habitual indifference as to the distinction between truth and falsehood. In matters which are not susceptible of proof, courtesy may require the largest and the most patient toleration even of absurdity; but it is not right or modest for any man to prescribe his particular view as a rule for the rest of the world, or to doubt that humanity at large has a depth of sympathy, a breadth of experience, where that is possible, and a reach of thought not to be despaired in comparison with his favorite system of mere speculation. So far as practical utility is concerned, there is a standard more or less apparent of truth and propriety. The moral law, as necessary, eternal, and universal, claims the obedience of all mankind, and all are interested in the mutual observance of it. But the moral law is concerned with actual facts and matters capable of positive proof rather than with things of mere speculation; nor can it be treated as applicable to these latter without danger of grievous injustice. He who teaches that it is right to steal, and thus encourages theft, is an enemy to society; but he who thinks that the planet Jupiter is, or that it is not, inhabited, or who thinks that his conscious existence will, or that it will not, be perpetuated in another world, after existence in this has ceased, has surely a right to his opinion, and mankind are interested in putting down by proper means the social or political tyranny which would interfere with that right.

The justice of the Tribune's claim of occupying the very foremost position among American public journals will hardly be rendered the more apparent by its advocacy of dogmas accepted by its editor, and resting on mere conjecture, as incontrovertibly true. One man's acceptance through faith of such a dogma affords to another no proof, or even presumption, of the truth of what is thus accepted. Therefore, such things are out of place in a journal claiming to enlighten mankind, and asserting its claim to general approval on that ground. Prejudice, as such, ignores reason, which is the groundwork of argument, and reason, which can operate only by virtue of convictions and apprehensions of truth already acquired, is silent where prejudice is made the groundwork of logic. If the assertion of truth has the air of absurdity to those whose prejudices stand in the way of its acceptance, the fault is not with those who assert the truth, but with those who, from ill-regulated mental action or want of adequate information, are incapable of receiving it. Indeed, many who are accustomed to read the Tribune cannot be indifferent to the danger it incurs of having the merit of its services in the diffusion of useful knowledge obscured and compromised by its advocacy of dogmas resting on faith, so-called, or vagrant speculation. It was no longer ago than the last month that the Tribune made this announcement: "What the world needs just now is, not simply scholars, littérateurs, or theologians, but men on fire with the message given them to deliver, men absolutely constrained to their work by the love of Christ." This is the technical acceptance and approval of the principle of sectarian servitude. It is at least charitable to consider that the imputation of fanaticism on occasion of the plain and simple statement of an interesting fact could come with sincerity or good grace only from the fanaticism really prevailing somewhere else than with Mr. Conway.

What is natural and true is a more important question than what is fashionable, unless Nature can be improved upon by fashion. Without attempting to do justice to what is judicious and unexceptionable in the editorial referred to, it is no more than fair to say that, although the Tribune does not say so in terms, yet in advocating a system understood to be supernatural it would seem to agree with Rev. Dr. Bellows in thinking that Nature can be improved upon.

The quotation in the last INDEX from Rev. Dr. Bellows is as follows: "The ground alike of Trinitarian and Unitarian Christianity is that the religion of Jesus has an authority peculiar to itself; established and vindicated historically, that it is a permanent religion, destined to universal sway; that it cannot be improved, and that essential changes in it are fallings away from the truth. Nothing making a less claim than this can be called a revealed religion, or an absolute religion, or be at anything less than a disadvantage as compared even with natural religion." There is in this a confusion of ideas, to say the least. Here religion is admitted to be natural and subject to necessity of natural conditions, and yet the words imply that natural religion is so very imperfect that any one of several other religions, which of course must all be artificial, may be far superior to it. At this rate, we must not be surprised if we hear before long of some newly-invented magnetism or chemistry, far superior to that which is natural. If religion has anything in it of the nature of moral virtue, it would seem plain enough that all real and substantial religion must be natural, and that consequently all that comes in to set it aside and supply its place must be false and spurious. If what is claimed to be religion has in it nothing of the nature of moral virtue, and especially if it despairs of the very principle of human virtue and ignores it, then it is plain enough that the less we have of such pretended religion, the better. It is something else than the part of reason, or piety, or modesty to pretend that the supposed Divine hand which conducts and energizes Nature's law has been seen to have become, in the progress of time, more and more skilful by practices, or that others have graciously stepped in and perfected the crude work of the Almighty. If this is the drift of our reverend doctors and our preaching public journalists, they ought to be careful how they wander beyond the limits of their special sphere, lest they be set down as more ignorant of divine things than some of our pietistic Senators, in proposing an amendment to the Constitution, lately showed themselves to be of contemporaneous history and of the legitimate functions of civil government.

CHARLES COLLINS.

NORTHUMBERLAND, Pa., Aug. 31, 1876.

THE DECAY OF SUPERSTITION.

ONTARIO, Sept. 17, 1876.

ED. INDEX:

Sir,—It is, I believe, a fact that the terrors of future punishment are now less frequently referred to in our pulpits than they used to be, and that the term "Hell" is rarely mentioned. If this be true, as I believe it is, may we not look forward to the day when this terrible dogma of the Orthodox faith shall be entirely cast aside as no longer the belief of either clergy or people?

There have been periods in history when the ferocity of men could not be restrained by the Church except by appeals to their fears. The migration of barbarians to Southern Europe from the North, at various periods, imposed upon the Church the most difficult task she ever had to perform; and any means in her power to employ to bring these hordes under subjection, would be, perhaps, justifiable. Goth and Visigoth might be cowed by the prospect of retribution, presented to his imagination by a vivid description of Hell; and if this oral description were not sufficient, the Church might add, by the resources of art, such representations as would bring before the eye of the barbarian the scene and the victim. The Church knew well the value of art either to kindle devotion or to excite terror.

Is it not a matter of surprise that a dogma so repulsive to reason should have held its place so long, and particularly in these days when science and intelligence are so generally diffused? May not one cause of its longevity be that the dogma never probably secured any strong, active belief? For the mind would instinctively recoil from it, and unconsciously reject the justice of so terrible a punishment. John Stuart Mill says, in one of his posthumous essays, that "nobody except a hypocondriac here and there ever really believes that he is in any very serious danger of incurring these punishments."

The effect of this dogma in the present day, would be to repel rather than attract; to excite terror and hostility rather than admiration and love. Horrible as this doctrine is, and incompatible with the existence of a benevolent and just Creator, it is not without an effort that a man bred in Christianity can confidently reject it; but when, however, he has arrived at this point, the love of truth, his aim and his guide, will induce him to proceed farther, until he has embraced, in his review, the whole Christian scheme.

What tends much to perpetuate our ignorance and superstition is our unwillingness to examine the grounds of those doubts which must occur to every man of any intelligence as to the truth and authenticity of doctrines taught us from childhood, as axioms not to be questioned.

The shackles in which our minds were so early bound are, however, day by day, becoming lighter; and as the liberating process advances, so will our hesitation become less and less operative, until at last we shall find it to be an imperative duty to investigate for ourselves, and not to content ourselves with what interested and paid expounders so dogmatically teach us as truth.

I. FINLAYSON, M.D.

MARTYRS WANTED.

We need martyrs. Society is venal and without the enthusiasm of truth. The faith of decaying religion has lost its grip, and Christians are no longer able to stop the mouths of lions or infidels. But they are making a desperate effort at present to reinstate the ninth century in the nineteenth. The Church has not yet given up the hope of recovering its lost power. The Romanist, as well as the Protestant, is struggling to regain authority; and both are working earnestly to secure their ends. The Liberal element which opposes both Catholic and Protestant, is doing very little to thwart their purpose. Secularism lacks enthusiasm. In its eye evolution will do the whole work; so it lumps the job and lets the world wag on. A good fat martyr at the stake would do the world more good just now, it seems to me, than anything else. We are, as a liberal people, too indifferent about the great principles of liberty. We are asleep while our foes are awake and quietly undermining the very ground on which we stand.

Why should God's name be put in the Constitution? "To honor him." How do you know it will honor him? How do you know but that it will dishonor him? The nation has lived one hundred years without the name of any God in the Constitution, and the country has prospered; whence the necessity now of injecting therein some deific name? Has it come to that, that the Creator must have his name engraven on everything? If it is essential that the Deity have a name on the charter of our liberties, which name shall we put there? Shall it be Brahma or Jehovah? Krishna or Christ? Buddha or Mohammed?

If this constitutional recognition of Deity possesses such great merit, it is remarkable that the Southern Confederacy should fall when their Constitution plainly acknowledged him, and professed allegiance to him.

It is painful, indeed, to see how many good people can be duped by the specious arguments against the Constitution, against free speech, free religion or no religion, against a free press. I would be charitable, but I cannot believe the agitators in this movement are either intelligent, generous, or just. They must be aware of the fact that such amendments as have been proposed would be no amendment to the Constitution, but its overthrow.

W. S. BELL.

NEW BEDFORD, Mass.

AUSTIN KENT.

It is fitting that something more than a desultory allusion to the demise of this pioneer in the cause of freethought should be made.

Here was a man, for long years a cripple, devoted to the diffusion of principles which had as their end and aim the promotion of liberal views.

He was possessed of an intellect of no common order. His many works and communications, which from time to time made their appearance in the Investigator, THE INDEX, and I doubt not other papers of the liberal school, are sufficient proof and evidence of this. He always manifested a kind and courteous spirit.

From what I have been able to learn, his bodily infirmities were borne in a spirit of patience and forbearance.

We shall all miss his familiar words in our papers. One by one the fathers of Liberalism are passing off the stage of action. It is to be hoped that there are those who may fill their places. The times call for workers in the cause, especially as the upholders of Christian views are uniting their forces to put down those who endeavor to disseminate principles which make for the common good of the republic.

Let us all do our part in this good work, and thus emulate the example of our departed friend, Austin Kent.

Yours respectfully,

EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

THE USE OF A PRIEST.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 18, 1876.

ED. INDEX:

Dear Sir,—A Unitarian friend once told me of a little anecdote which I think is too good to lose, and none the worse for being literally true.

His female domestic so often used the term "Holy Virgin, Mother of God," as to annoy him. Although he did not make a practice of trying to unsettle any person's religious faith, he felt compelled for once to question her as follows: "Why, Bridget, who made the Virgin Mary?" "God," was the prompt reply. "Did God make his own mother?" was next asked. This was evidently a "pooner"; but after cogitating a few moments, she replied, "I don't know how that could be, but the priest says it is so." "But, Bridget," said he, "you need not believe all that the priest tells you." She quickly replied with evident sincerity, "Faith! and sure, what is the use of having a priest if you cannot believe all he tells you?"

Yours respectfully,

EDW. LINE.

ROMANISTS believe in religious liberty for countries like the United States, in which they are in the minority. In other countries, however, like Austria, where they have ruled for ages, they will not concede an inch of freedom unless they are compelled. The Missionary Herald states the position of the missionaries of the American Board in Austria thus: "They can enter no pulpit; they can hold no public service to preach the Gospel; they cannot even occupy a room for a Bible-reading or lecture unless official leave is given by the authorities; they cannot sell, or give away, or even loan, a tract without risking the penalties of the law."

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent. On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.
 Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.

Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interest Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. CIRCULATE IT EVERYWHERE!

The new Liberal League Tract entitled,
"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"
 contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
 2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
 3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
 4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
 5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.
- This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER,

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers. The

TIME IS SHORT,

Before the vast interests at stake will be settled for years, by Congressional action; and the

NECESSITY IS GREAT

For unselfishness, boldness, and promptitude, on the part of all genuine friends of religious liberty and equality.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies at least ought to be circulated forthwith; and the sooner the better.

Ten Thousand Copies

Are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly mailed, at the bare cost of paper, press-work, and postage, on the following terms:—

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church; in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE REPORT that Mr. William E. Dodge is going as a missionary among the Sioux, to prevail on Sitting Bull to keep the Sabbath, is pronounced untrue. His experiment with General Newton probably discourages him.

THE FIRST number of the Sunday Review, a new quarterly periodical, has been issued for the current month by Trübner & Co., London. It is edited by a committee of the Sunday Society, and is devoted to an excellent movement for the increase of Sunday freedom for the people of England.

A VERY EMINENT COOK is preparing, with more than French culinary skill, what will doubtless be recorded in history as the Great and General Centennial Stew of Massachusetts, in which "small philosophers" like Ralph Waldo Emerson are to be served up as oysters for the Orthodox, while the proud artist of the occasion is to stick his ladle in his hat-band, fold his arms, and smile grimly at the empty shells.

THE PAINE BUST was presented on October 13 by Mr. Kilgore, on behalf of the donors and the committee, to Hon. William S. Stokley, Mayor of Philadelphia. Mr. George A. Smith, President of Select Council, submitted Mayor Stokley's communication, with Mr. Kilgore's letter, to that body; and, on motion of Mr. Jones, they were laid on the table. What further action, if any, is to be taken, we are not informed.

THERE is in Boston a new light of Orthodoxy, Rev. Joseph Cook by name, who has been radiating darkness upon the subject of "Evolution" in a way that threatens to bring upon the "small philosophers of Massachusetts" (as he styles them) a more terrible "Twilight of the Gods" than overtook the old divinities at Bayreuth. Wagner ought to be sent for at once, to get up the final catastrophe with due dramatic splendor; while prudent insurance companies will in hot haste cancel all their policies in Concord, the doomed Walhalla of the impending conflagration.

THERE ARE some ways, it seems, of advocating State Secularization which we should be sorry to see adopted in this country: "It is the custom in Lima when any religious question is debated in Parliament for the ladies to go to the House of Assembly, carefully watch the proceedings, and, after a way of their own, take part in them. For example, during the last debate on liberty of worship, each speaker who defended the proposal to separate the Church from the State had a garland of weeds flung at his head from the ladies' gallery, and the defenders of the Church were honored with garlands."

RUSSIA is as intolerant as Spain, to judge by this statement: "Two hundred members of the Russian sect of 'Old Believers,' who had been banished to the Ural because they refused to join the Orthodox Russian Church, have been treated by the Russian authorities with a cruelty which has hitherto been supposed to be only characteristic of Turks. Having been ordered for service in the penal regiments at Petro-Alexandrovsk, on the Caspian, they were so ill-used that many perished on the road, and others jumped into the sea to avoid their oppressors, and one hundred only arrived at their destination."

AN ENGLISH Methodist minister has written to Cardinal Manning to request for Spanish Protestants the same tolerance which Roman Catholics enjoy in England. The Cardinal replied that "where the people of a country are all of one mind about a religion it is only right that the latter should be vigorously supported by laws." There is infinite impudence in this reply. Where the people of a country are all of "one mind" about a religion, whom are the "vigorously supported" laws to reach? What need of them at all, unless somebody fails to be of "one mind" with the rest? The Cardinal merely means that the majority must make him of "one mind" with the rest, or get rid of him; and that is what Rome means for this country, when she is able to carry it out.

THE PONDEROUS CHAMPION of Orthodoxy, Rev. Joseph Cook, who marches over the ruins of Radicalism once a week at the Melosmen, with what one of his admirers effusively designates as "an elephantine tread," is the latest sensation of this Modern Athens. His Monday lectures bristle with so many heads that Evolution herself is at last scared, and peers anxiously in all directions for a new Hercules to decapitate this lineal descendant of the Lernaean Hydra. But unless the Boston Globe does him most woful and unusual injustice, this doughty theologian does not know the difference between Hegel the philosopher and Professor Ernst Haeckel, of Jena, for the former's name occurs eight or ten times in a single lecture where the latter's alone should have been used. Probably the "elephantine tread" is too heavy for such small differences. His lectures are the latest samples of "inflation" we have seen. Rev. M. J. Savage did not overstate the truth, when he wrote to the Globe that this bustling demolisher of Evolution "betrays a method that would do honor to the assumption and the face of a book-agent."

THE GRAND RAPIDS (Michigan) Eagle is quoted as follows by a New York paper: "The Eagle of last Friday contained a circular from Chief of Police Moran, in which he informed the citizens of what he intended to do in obedience to the Council's orders that the police enforce the statutes and city ordinances relative to Sunday, the first day of the week. The enforcement of the Chief's circular has led to many arrests for alleged violation of the Sunday laws, in divers ways, and many arrests are yet to be made. The most numerous class of alleged offenders are those who went to the post-office yesterday noon to post or receive mail. Forty-four citizens' names were taken, and warrants have been served on them. Twenty-five or thirty milk-peddlers have been arrested for vending or delivering milk on Sunday, and the owners and employees of two barber-shops are to be arrested for keeping their establishments open. The employees of the Gas Company were arrested for laboring in the gas works on Sunday. The employees of the Valley City and Crescent Flouring Mills were arrested for laboring in the mills on Sunday. The employees of the Times and Democrat offices were arrested for laboring on those papers after midnight Saturday night, or on Sunday morning."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and feasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Gods Admonition.

A SERMON DELIVERED AT ATLANTA, GA., OCT. 23, 1876.

BY RABBI HENRY GERSONI.

We often hear the stale adage, "Life is but a dream." Pulpit orators take this phrase as the keynote of their sermons, and, illustrating in glowing images the "instability of life," as they call it, and creating in their imagination an eternity teeming with singing angels or cruel demons, they try to lure or to frighten the sinner from his wicked course. Their object may be good, but their system is fallacious. For life is not a dream; it is a reality.

"Life is real, life is earnest,
 And the grave is not its goal;
 Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
 Was not spoken of the soul."

Aye, and not of the body either, in the sense in which it is generally understood. Everything in Nature is eternal. Not an atom of matter is lost in the economy of Nature, and not an idea of truth is lost in the history of existence. No matter into what chemical combination the substances which compose our frames may enter after dissolution, which we are so used to call death, they will continue to exist in perpetual action and counteraction, forming the unperishable "wheels in wheels" of Nature, which is at the throne of the great I AM the Eternal Existence. Those who try to persuade themselves that "life is but a dream" close their eyes to the fact that their own lives are tinged with the impressions, ideas, fancies, and attainments of life that has been before they were in the world,—and thus the very life which they declare perishable asserts itself otherwise in themselves. Life is not a dream: it is reality.

"The grass dryeth out, the sprout fadeth away; but the word of our God standeth forever," was spoken by the prophet in one breath. This most beautiful passage gives the truthful pledge of immortality. It takes for its evidence the very phenomenon which our false prophets take to prove a mortality. This "instability of life," this constant rotation of growth and decay, this perpetual renovation of the aspects of life, proves that there is no mortality; that "the word of our God standeth forever." Nature is the word of our God. Therefore be not afraid, my friends; you will not die. Once called into existence, we shall continue to exist. The truth, the divine soul, the breath of God within us, will live forever in God, its author and the source from whence it sprang. Although we do not presume to know anything definite about this eternal existence of the soul, we know, we feel that there is such an existence in store for us.

This is a cheerful message to those who have no reason to be afraid of an existence which is hidden from the knowledge of man. But it is an awful message for the sinner. A perpetual existence for the man who is afraid to meet the next hour; a universal existence in common with all for the one who shuns the sight of the next man; an existence in the light and truth of God for such as would fain crouch in darkness, hiding their sins and their disgrace from their fellow-beings,—aye, it means something frightful! More frightful than the brimstone localities and the monstrosities which the fertile imagination of our theological friends creates for us!

And the consciousness of this eternal existence does frighten every sinner, and gives him a taste of his deserved punishment while he lives. If you hear a man boasting of his sins, believe not that he is so courageous as not to be afraid of the consequences of sin. The wrong he has committed and boasts of, he does not consider a wrong. He thinks that the social organization which considers such an act wrong is mistaken in its notions, and that he is in the right, deprecating the rule of this organization. He boasts of his philosophy, which does not consider such an action wrong. This is what the Talmud says: "He who repeatedly commits a certain sin considers it a lawful act." He is therefore not afraid to speak of it; but he is the more anxious to hide such of his actions which he knows to be wrong.

The thief, for instance, will tell his mates about the theft he has committed; he will boast of the ingenuity and skill he has displayed by perpetrating this act. But he will be afraid to tell how he has played false toward his fellow in crime. Against all the rest of society he has a grudge, and he claims an imaginary right to steal; while he knows that he has no such right against those who are on the level with him.

The sensualist will boast of his achievements among his friends; for by a false notion he considers the social laws which forbid him his sinful pleasure as mere superstitions. But he will be afraid to reveal the falsehood and knavery which were the means by which he has achieved his object.

I could multiply examples to prove that every sinner is afraid—as he has good reason to be—of sin! And the conscience which has become dull on one side will sting the sharper on the other. The moral constitution of man is like a skillful knitting; where one loop becomes loose, the whole web is impaired. When one moral principle is spoiled, no other principle can be trusted. In this sense our sages have said: "One sin is the cause of another one." The loosened loop must be skillfully and promptly fastened, or the whole fabric will go to pieces.

But there are our unphilosophical friends who have no other excuse but "circumstances." It is true, "circumstances" may sometimes press us out of the right path. But with a strong-hearted, brave man, this pressure cannot last long. He who complains about "circumstances" being the cause of his sin, and perseveres in the wrong path, is either a weak-minded fool or a hypocritical knave. Hear ye the awful admonition of God: "Sin lurketh at the door; its desire is toward thee; but thou shalt subvert it! Thou canst do it if thou wilt!"

Man is created in the image of God; the breath of divine wisdom animates him to elevate him above the brute creation, and not to make him the slave of animal passions, or worthless desires, or thoughtless fancies. There is something more than mere animal instinct which teaches man to brave the changes of climate, the fury of the elements, for physical and changeable life. And there is certainly something higher and loftier in him which prompts him to aspirations and hopes of which he cannot give himself a clear account. This is the very "breath of God" which makes him the lord and ruler of creation here, and is the pledge of an eternal existence hereafter. And this is what enables him to place himself in opposition to everything that threatens to degrade him as a superior being. He who yields to threatening or alluring "circumstances," and neglects his advantage as a rational being to maintain his dignity as a man, is unworthy of the name of man; he degrades himself to the position of a lower creature. He is useless to the society of man. Divine truth does not recognize him any more as a superior being; it asks: "Adam, where art thou?" Aye, the sinner is no more the man! Eternal wisdom finds him not in the place which has been destined for him. In this sense our Talmudists have said: "No man becomes a sinner unless a spirit of folly (loss of his right senses) has entered into him." A man in his right senses, with the consciousness of his superior station in life, cannot degrade himself with sinful actions.

"But what is sin?" I hear some ask me now. My friends, do not ask me this question, for I cannot give you any definite answer. Do not rely on the explanations of our friends, the theologians, for they cannot tell you what sin is, nor can they give you the right means to avoid it. Most of them deal in patent medicine for moral sickness. No human being can tell the other one of his sin. It is only God, the Creator, to whom your sins are known. And it is only he who can tell of your sins and how to amend them. And he makes it known to you, not in articulate words, not in writings on parchment, or in any time-honored book or books, but by his work in Nature and through the voice of your own conscience.

The more you study the work of God in the universe, the deeper you penetrate into the wisdom which rules, controls, and maintains the order of the universe, the more you listen to the voice of God "in the spirit of the times," in the progress and development of the human race, so much the clearer will you perceive what is right and wrong, the better will you be able to judge about your own actions. A sense of unspeakable pleasure and self-assurance will tell you of the good that is in you; a feeling of untold mortification and dejection will announce the wrong you have done. And it is better you listen to this voice of God yourself than to rely on others to interpret it to you. "Tant de gens entre Dieu et moi!" exclaimed a French philosopher, who was considered an infidel by sanctimonious knaves. Judaism, however, fully approves of this sentiment. We need no people between God and ourselves; we need no books to tell us what pleases or displeases our Father in heaven. Wisdom and knowledge, patented by the approval of sound reason and sealed with the harmonious feelings of peace and love,—these alone can teach us what is right in the sight of the One who "creates peace in his heavens." Study the world, material and spiritual, and see how far your own actions and feelings harmonize with it. In this way the heaven will speak to you, the earth will speak to you, the shadows of your own actions that will pass in your memories in the stillness of the night will speak to you; and from your own flesh you will see your God and learn his pleasure, as the sages of old did.

Do you notice those wrinkles, those crow's-feet, around the eyes of you young faces? They may be the consequences of sickness or hard struggle in life. You can efface them by kindness, and smooth them out with your sympathy or sympathetic actions. If they be the marks of sin and dissipation, they are the signs of God's inscription, as he has ever written on the faces of sinners. Nothing but mending his ways will help the sinner. It is an account which he has to square with offended Nature. It remains for him alone to take heed of this "God's admonition," and to avoid the threatening consequences by restoring the harmony of his own constitution which he has disturbed. Nobody can tell him how to do it, for nobody knows—nor has anybody a right to inquire—why these marks have been engraven on him. Prayer will not help him, for actions and not words have been the cause of these "God's marks."

Do you notice that man who leads an isolated life? He shuns the noise of the world and brings a sense of mistrust and cheerlessness into the hearts of those who come into contact with him. It is because he yields to his fancies and notions which are in discord with the social order and with the natural feelings of his human heart. If he will apply his ideas to action, the laws of social organization will punish him. If he is a coward and has not the courage to bring his thoughts into action, isolation and a feeling of estrangement will gnaw at his life. But his sickness is known to him alone; let him make peace with the order of society at the cost of his egotism and he will be restored to society, and the blessings of social life will be his reward.

Every one of us here has some hidden thought, the memory of some hidden actions, which he is afraid to make known to society. He feels that they are or were in discord with the harmony of the whole. Let every one of us therefore apply the cure which a clear knowledge of what is good and harmonious with the rest will dictate to him, and escape the punishment which threatens him. This is the fear of the Lord, and its beneficial results are peace and harmony with all, good will towards all. The feelings of fear or shame which we have at the thought of our wrong actions becoming known are the admonitions of God himself. They tell us where the wrong is and how it is to be mended. And every man, worthy of the name, is his own spiritual guide in this respect.

"May it be so that your fear of the Lord be equal to your fear of men!" was the last blessing which a dying Rabbi bestowed on his disciples. "The man with whom men are pleased is also the spirit of God pleased," is the wise saying of another Rabbi. "Every punishment that comes upon a man is the consequence of a lack of enlightenment," says a third Rabbi.

"Let us search our ways, and inquire deeply, and return to the Eternal," is the admonition of the prophet. Storm in harvest-time, irregularity in the working of the elements, was Samuel's evidence of sin. I could multiply quotations to show how Judaism teaches that sin and punishment, the admonition of God and the reconciliation of the sinner, are in this world and of this world. We can perceive them with our senses or understand their nature by analogy, and mend ourselves by an honest application of thought to action. Thus God has made known his will by the laws on which he has fixed the order of the universe. May we always listen to that voice of God, and of Eternal Existence, in the light of truth and in the bliss of harmony with all, and heavenly peace will be our portion in the bosom of our Father, who is "the place of the universe." Amen.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

The discussion, in THE INDEX (closed with the issue of August 10, 1876), between Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker and myself, in respect to Proudhon, leads to the opportunity, and in some sense to the necessity, for an attempt to give to the readers of THE INDEX some fair understanding of the nature of universo-logy. Col. William B. Greene, who has been alluded to by both Mr. Tucker and myself, and for whom, as one of our first minds, I have the utmost esteem, as the friend of Mr. Tucker, requests of me, in a card in THE INDEX of September 7, to make such a presentation; and to this course the editor of THE INDEX has kindly added his own personal invitation. So encouraged, I will endeavor to do what is required of me, fully aware of the difficulty of the effort to assign to a "condensed statement" what would more appropriately be the burden of a text-book.

Condensed statements are far advanced and severe thinkers, and the majority of the readers of a journal even so elevated in rank as THE INDEX can hardly, it is probable, be classed in the latter category. Considering, therefore, that I can hardly hope for an appreciation of what I shall have to expound from more than a portion of those to whom it will be tendered, I shall carefully avoid any abuse of the privilege accorded to me, even at the risk of some misapprehension from the want of more elaboration.

For the merely preliminary statement of what universo-logy is, the reader is referred to the last half of my reply to Mr. Tucker (INDEX August 10). That statement will enable the reader to know about the subject. But to know about a thing is one thing, and to know the thing itself is quite another thing. I am now to undertake to enable one to know universo-logy itself in some measure,—still, however, a very primary and incipient sense; to give to the reader that insight at least which will enable him to judge whether it is the kind of thing which it would interest him to pursue further, by the study of the more extended expositions contained in books published and to be published on the subject. I must, at the same time, however, occupy a portion of the very limited space which I feel is assigned to me, in simple declaration of the true nature and immense scope and value of this new sciento-philosophy. If I had my readers in class, as an organized university, held by any considerations to the exhaustive study of the whole subject, it might be more logical, and it might seem to be more modest, to leave them to come to their own conclusions, in due time, as to the applications and true estimate of what I have to teach; but grown people are no longer children, to be set to their tasks, irrespective of their own judgment of the ulterior uses and value of what they are to be taught. The propounder of new truth for them, has the double task of imparting the knowledge, and of maintaining the interest of the learners through the preliminary drudgery, by assurances and by encouragements drawn from an occasional picture of the charms of the new realm into which their laborious first steps are about to induct them.

In the article I have alluded to, I have spoken of universo-logy as a method in science and philosophy. It is, in fact, all of these,—a method, a science, and a philosophy; and, as it is more specifically a philosophy within and of the sciences, it is also best described by the new coinage, sciento-philosophy. It will be best, perhaps, to begin by considering it as a method, and by contrasting it inferentially with the methods which have hitherto prevailed.

Swedenborg speaks of continuous degrees, and of discrete degrees; and of the former as lower, and of the latter as higher, in rank. A continuous degree, in the progress of thought, would be the farther on evolution, and the greater perfection of knowledge, by a process or method already initiated, pursued, and prevalently known. A discrete degree, in this domain, would be the discovery of a fresh initiation, and the inauguration of a new method. Universo-logy is a discrete degree, or differs, in this manner, by a discrete degree, from everything which has been known as science or philosophy in the past, and must stand or fall upon its own merits. The first thing, therefore, of which the inquirer is to be warned, is that he must avoid confounding it with a mere expansion of something which he already knows. He must consent to study it on its own grounds; and for that purpose must begin by acquiring some insight into its domain and its method.

The domain covered by universo-logy, in the first instance, is as new as the method, and is one which has been overlooked and neglected by the thinkers of all schools. I say, in the first instance, because when it has been elaborated, on its own ground, and in its own way, it then invades the fields of all past thinkers; surveys them by new and improved instruments of measurement; accepts, rehabilitates and perfects all old systems; annexes them to the new, and ends in a grand reconciliation of all human conceptions. It is, then, the philosophy of reconciliation or integralism. We need, therefore, to begin by defining the peculiar domain of universo-logy, as well as its method; and, in so primary an exhibit as this, it will not be necessary to keep them formally distinct.

As to domain and method conjointly, suppose, then, that we take our departure from Hegel. He divides the universe, as the totality of the subject-matter of human contemplation, into three grand departments or domains. These are (disposing them in our own order, not his), 1. Nature; 2. Mind (or human nature); and 3. (an intermediate) "Logic," the domain of Laws and Principles. In other words, there is first an outer or objective world, the domain of physics in the largest of the senses ever attached to that overloaded and overworked technicality; in a word the domain of "Nature," occupied by that whole immense army of investigators who strive to arrogate to themselves the name of scientists; hence the region of science or the sciences, excluding psychology. There is, then, secondly, Mind, expanding vaguely into metaphysics, or that which is beyond or aside from physics, and especially including and allied with psychology, or mental philosophy. Thirdly, there is the intermediate or third realm, called "Logic," for the want of a better name, but meaning a thousand times more than school logic, which is hardly more than a branch of the mere science of mind; somewhat as common salt, having given its name to "the salts," in chemistry, proves to be no salt at all, itself.

There are, then, we may say, three worlds: 1. An objective or outer world, called "nature"; 2. A subjective or inner world, called "mind"; and 3. A middle, intangible, abstract world, more difficult of appreciation, called "logic," being the domain of the pure reason, of laws and principles, or of abstract truth and truths, which are neither the outer world of nature nor the inner world of mind merely as such.

Let us conceive these three worlds after this manner: I look at my face in a mirror. The image which I see, apparently back of the mirror, may stand for Nature. It is my objective world. I, myself, who cast the image, may stand for mind. I am my own subjective world. But intermediate between the subject and the object, which have grown to be familiar terms in philosophy, there is a third object, so limpid and level that it is invisible to the eye of the ordinary observer, and goes for nothing; while yet it is that object itself, the mirror, which by its peculiar properties is the central and main functionator in the whole scene. The mirror is, then, the analogue of that intermediate world, poorly described as logic, and which is the peculiar home and seat of transcendental science and philosophy, and, in the last analysis, of everything which is entitled to the name of either science or philosophy.

It is this which is peculiarly the realm of German or the so-called transcendental metaphysics, a domain which, so far from being exhausted (as our superficial sciolists in science would make us believe), is only just opened up or initiated by those greatest thinkers who have ever lived in the past, Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, worthily supplemented by our own Stallo, Hickok, and the Frothinghams. The glare of material successes in the world of "science" obscures, just for the present, the more solid values of absolute philosophy, somewhat as the vulgar nouveaux riches temporarily bedazzle and obscure the higher-style merits of a true aristocracy.

"Nature," or matter, is then objective; "mind" is subjective; and "logic" is intermediate. These three items of discrimination answer to or correspond with the meanings of the three universalizing prepositional words out, without, or outside of, in, within, or inside of, and between. Hegel begins with the between, as origin, and proceeds to the without, from which he reverts to the within. I have chosen to change the order, for our present purposes, so far as to begin with the without, proceed thence to the within, and revert to the between. Betweenness is relation; and the science of relation, abstractly and universally, is logic, in the broad Hegelian sense of the word. The relational department of grammar is the prepositional; and the universal summing up or generalization of the prepositions of grammar occurs in and as between the three prepositional words, without (outside of), within, and between. This is why we are conducted by Hegel's first grand distribution of the universe to this seemingly minute and trivial domain, the prepositions, and to a particular group of them; and this kind of connection between great things and small may give a suggestion of the scope and character of universo-logy.

Observe, in the next place, that two of these three worlds, or departments of universal being, can be thrown into a single class as distinct in kind from the third one; and so a binary division substituted for the ternary one. Matter and mind, the objective and the subjective, are alike, or constitute one class, in the fact that they are both concrete (grown to gether), thick, or real-like, as having body or substance; while logic, the intermediate realm, is abstract (drawn asunder), thin, filmy, or unreal-like. It is this bifold distribution which Herbert Spencer adopts as the basis of the total classification of the sciences, placing matter and mind, or universal physics and psychology, in one class as "the concrete," and the abstract domain, on the other hand, as "the abstract." Hegel in distributing the universe, and Spencer in distributing the sciences, are dealing virtually with the same subject-matter, since every domain or department of being is represented in or by the science of that domain; and with this mere change from the threefold to the twofold first branching, they two are brought into harmony with each other. It will be a great convenience if I may be allowed to be so technical as to call "the concrete" by the new term concretism, and "the abstract" by the corresponding new term abstractism, this termination -ism being taken, as by German usage, to denote a domain, or as equivalent to our English termination -dom.

The abstractism is then, as a whole, what Hegel means to cover by the term logic, including as he does quantity and its science, mathematics, under that head, as a branch of logic. Here again, however, Spencer differs, and divides the abstractism into (1) logic, and (2) the mathematics. These and a thousand other disharmonies among philosophers, in the extension of their terms or the meanings of words, hinder and discourage the student even more than the difficulty of the ideas; and it is part of the need of a universo-logy, that it should remove these obstacles, and bring order out of chaos, as between the several achievements of its predecessors, in the whole field of knowledge.

The science of the concretism we may now call concretology, and the science of the abstract, abstractology; and we may say, inversely, that the concretism subdivides into "nature," (or matter) and "mind"; as the abstractism does into logic, in the Spencerian sense, and the mathematics. It is obvious, therefore, that the twofold, the threefold, and the fourfold method of distribution can each be justified, a fact admirably demonstrated by Proudhon, in his Création de l'Ordre; but he has not shown, as it belongs to universo-logy to do, the precise plan, properties, and values of each of these methods, and their relations to each other, in an absolutely exhaustive classificatory system. It will suffice here if I call attention to the fact that these varying orders of the division of things necessarily relate to the series of primal number, one, two, three, four,—one being taken for the undistributed totality; and if I affirm that in the relations of these first numbers lies the nut of all classification, then, we have the authority of Mr. John Fluke for the dictum that "all knowledge is classification."

The without, the within, and the between, taken merely as words, are, as I have said, prepositions; more strictly speaking, spatial prepositions, passing readily into adverbs of place; but as ideas, they are geometrical, or more properly morphological, discriminations, and the most general or universalizing possible discriminations of that class; that is to say, of the statu or spatial, which is the governing order. We are thus carried back of words to the realm of form, for the objective source of those grand primal divisions which make the basis of Hegel's philosophy, and which are, in truth, the appropriate primal divisions of the universe, and so, in a sense, to the bottom region of philosophy.

But neither Hegel nor any of the philosophers has traced either these or any other of their fundamental discriminations into their relation with words, or forms (figures, diagrams), or with any objective realm whatsoever. They have brought them, therefore, to no objective tests, which would determine how far they were right; would correct them when wrong; and would serve as means of facilitating the acquisition and right understanding of the ideas themselves. Metaphysics or philosophy has thus remained a something apart from all objective or properly scientific knowledge; true, perhaps, but disconnected with real things, and only attainable by a class of minds which could hold bald, naked ideas before the mind, analyzing and combining them in a thousand ways, unaided by the slightest reference to anything tangible by the senses.

Universo-logy differs precisely at this point, and holds no idea to be constituted into a term of true knowledge, until it can be construed into its appropriate objective representations. It brings the abstruse and far-off truths of metaphysical philosophy out and down into the realm of common knowledge by means of their analogy with common things. Inversely, it refers all common things by the same analogy, back to those logical and metaphysical counterparts in the realm of pure ideas. It is, therefore, a unification of science and philosophy, a lifting of science and the sciences into unity, by the discovery of their fundamental and unifying principles; and on the other hand a scientizing of philosophy by bringing it forward into the details of all the sciences. In a word, universo-logy is neither philosophy, in its former purely abstruse and metaphysical significance, nor science, in that lower sense which excludes metaphysics; but it is a new and third thing, which by a new and simple and far-reaching discovery bridges over the wide chasm which has hitherto separated science and philosophy; constituting first a universal and all-inclusive one science, and then identifying it with logic in the Hegelian sense, and so again with metaphysics in the more generic and indiscriminate meaning of the word. Hence the term sciento-philosophy seems requisite to describe it; a term which also, in a less specific sense, is applicable to the generalizations of science made by Comte, Spencer, Haeckel, and others.

Let us now return to the threefold distribution of the universe, substantially equivalent to that of Hegel. For the two extremes we may say matter and mind, or the objective and the subjective,—the two sets of terms not being synonymous, but sufficiently nearly so, for this incipient allusion. For the middle or intermediate realm we have already before us a variety of expressions or namings; thus logic (Hegel), the abstract (Spencer), abstractology, and, as that which is most simple and most certainly right, the betweenity, or the between.

This realm of the abstract, as including a group of the sciences, Prof. Louis Elsberg, in his classification of the sciences, denominates "logics," he recommending the termination -tes, for the abstract sciences in the place of -ology, which he reserves for the concrete, and Prof. Michael A. Clancy, a pupil and teacher of the universological school, insists on the single word "language" for this department of being, in that immensely large sense in which it signifies all intermediation and communication whatsoever, whether vocal or otherwise. He may be inclined to intervene in this discussion, so far as to give his reasons for this preference, amounting with him to a fixed opinion based on universological grounds.

In this latter view of the case, this first threefold distribution of universal things is greatly simplified, and is merely to be stated as (1) matter, (2) mind, and (3) language. It may be appropriate to state here, that the first specific outgrowth of universology is a universal language—Alwato (Ahl-wah-to),—the immense scope of which seems fully to justify Prof. Clancy's idea that language fills the entire domain intermediate between matter and mind.

But setting aside this latter view, for the present, and confining ourselves to the term abstractism, as naming the domain of this betweenity, it in turn divides, not with Spencer and Elsberg into two merely, but into three grand subordinate domains; the lowest of which, repeating "nature" or matter, is catalogic, or the whole grammatica-logical domain; dipping backward more especially into the science of mind, the middle one of which is mathematics, repeating the betweenity; and the third or highest one of which is analogic, the new abstract science which universology brings to light, and which leans rather to the outer or material world, while yet originating subjectively, and repeating mind.

It now appears that mathematics is the middle of the betweenity; and, as such, it is peculiarly the central, germinal, or origivative sphere of universal being. Universology pivots, therefore, upon mathematical discriminations. The primal differences of number and form furnish the type for all true classification, whether of matter or mind. The middle ground yields the new clew to the acquisition of all knowledge. This is the new domain, and departure from it the new method referred to. "Science" finds in matter the field for its spacial exertitation; philosophy in mind, and its allied metaphysical domain,—even the logic of Hegel more strictly falls here, though I began by conceding it the middle ground; and the true betweenity, or the middle ground proper, is this new domain of thought and being, which holds tenaciously to mathematical analogies; and sciento-philosophy belongs, strictly speaking, to this realm.

I have so far, therefore, merely conducted my "condensed statement" to its proper beginning-point. In another article, which I hope may not be long delayed, I will endeavor to make obvious what I mean by the mathematical analogies, and to give such illustrations as to render the general field of analogic comprehensible.

Proudhon, in the work I have alluded to, made a noteworthy effort to bring the abstrusities of philosophy out into the clearness of scientific expression; but he came short of making the definite discovery of the virtual identity between the broadest speculative discriminations, and the simplest, most immediate, and most specific of mathematical differences.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

ORGANIZATION OF LIBERALS.

I am waiting with a good deal of interest to see what response will be made to the call for immediate and thorough organization of liberals, and I am sure, whatever may be the precise danger of impending legislation on the school question the coming winter, we cannot be too quick nor too much in earnest about it. In the first place, we have already in the field against us a large, active, well-organized, and well-disciplined foe, untiring in effort, relentless in purpose, and evidently not scrupulous in methods. In addition to the organization of the National Reform Association, the movers of that scheme have practically in their hands the working machinery of the entire Protestant Church. The members of the National Reform Association are the active portion of that Church concerning these questions. The remainder, if they do not actively join the Association, yet fail to indicate any preference for the secular side, and so by a passive neutrality put the entire representation into the hands of the active few. If a million active voters vote yea on a given scheme, and a remaining ten or fifteen million keep silent with shut mouth, it is but fair in logic and in fact to infer that the voting million represent the whole number; and this in effect is always done.

It is also to be noted that nearly every resolution of the passive element in the Church throws that element into the active ranks of the Association. The conversion of a neutral church member is seldom to the support of the secular State, but usually the reverse; and the fact is one of the most significant signs of the times, indicating imminent danger. So long as the balance of sentiment seemed to hang nearly even in the Church, inclining little one way or the other, there was possible ground for hope that, when the movement came, it would be on the secular side; but now, since such movement begins to show itself clearly on the other side, the ultimate preponderance can no longer be in doubt. The downward movement is already begun, and the motion is now sure to find constant acceleration, like that of all falling bodies, until it reaches bottom.

The constituency of the National Reform Association are almost wholly inside the Protestant Church, and the Protestant pulpit stands open as a direct avenue through which that constituency can be reached. Nearly if not quite all the agents of the Association are accredited ministers in that pulpit, and find therein easy and welcome access. The appeal made falls directly into line with the average instruction of the pulpit. The logic of the National Reform Association and the logic of the pulpit, as has so often been pointed out in THE INDEX, are absolutely one. In both, the same motives and the same fears are appealed to, the same alarm cry raised, the same passions stirred, the same ambitions excited, and the same duties enforced. The constituency inside the Church are only awaiting the demands of a clear, practical issue to fall into line as active members of the Association, and as an aggressive party against the secular interests of the State and against all personal rights therein involved. It is a party that will be found well trained and thoroughly armed and equipped for its work.

The liberal sentiment of the country cannot cope with this active and organized foe without an active and organized constituency of its own. A few isolated, single-handed liberals cannot do it. It is a movement that cannot be talked or reasoned down. The day of argument has passed by on that side. It has come down entirely from that field of controversy. In the field of thought and before the bar of reason, the movement has lost its case already in advance, and is more or less conscious of the fact. One advantage, however, remains in its hands. It has a strong hold upon many organized institutions which still occupy more or less the public ground. These institutions are held by the assumed rights of possession, and are henceforth to be defended on these grounds. It is now a question of might and a question of numbers, and not any longer a question of argument or of reason.

The aggressiveness of the movement is to be pushed forward on the same grounds, and there is no resistance against it which can avail, except the resistance of right and reason backed by organized might. We are utterly defenceless on the existing field of controversy without organization. The controversy is pushed forward into the field of politics and civil life, and is to be determined by the majority of organized numbers. The Legislature of the country has no way of knowing the will of the people except by counting votes, and unorganized votes cannot be counted. The attempt of Republican Senators to vote away the rights of liberals under the defeated school amendment, with such supreme unconsciousness of a single liberal in the country in whom such rights inhered, grew out of the fact that liberals as such have no sign by which to make their presence known. And since liberals themselves are so little conscious of their own rights in this matter, Republican Senators are not to be too much blamed for their deficiency. There is no possible representation on the field of controversy in which our rights are now sought to be invaded, except an organized one, and the sooner we organize as liberals to defend them, the better will our own appreciation of those rights be shown, and as a consequence the better will be the recognition of them by others. He that will be free must strike the first blow himself, and nobody will take up the liberal cause until liberals take it up for themselves.

There is another reason for the immediate organization of liberals in a fact which is likely to be taken by many minds as an occasion for delay of such action. I refer to the covert and indirect character of the movement against us in its initiatory steps towards realization upon the field of politics and civil life. This covert and indirect character is already illustrated in the Bible clause of the defeated school amendment above referred to, and is likely to find more ample illustration in many ways in the progress of the controversy. The National Reform Association have an issue, it is true, direct and open enough; but that issue is not likely to find its way into the national life, full-grown in form and feature at the outset. It is more likely to come in, if at all, by piecemeal, and to gain at first some indirect and covert advantage. This will become the stepping-stone to more direct and open ones, and so by gradual acquisitions the whole object will be accomplished. This is the natural history of all incipient movements, and is not likely to be disproved in this case more than in another.

It is to be remembered, also, in this connection, that it is the absolute secular entirety of the National Constitution which is the one great impeding obstacle in way of the success of the whole Christianizing scheme; and that entirety can be broken more easily by indirection than otherwise, and quite as effectively. The scheme has now the entire logic of the Church, as already indicated, on its side. It has also the logic of a vast number of national precedents and customs, and the logic of many State constitutions and State laws. Many of these constitutions and laws would need little change to carry into effect the whole Christian amendment, should it pass the National Legislature. Many more could make little difference, after that result had been accomplished. All these facts are accumulated in a strong argument in favor of that amendment. The National Constitution, however, in its absolute secular entirety, remains forever a complete and absolute rebuttal of the whole array. This is seen and keenly felt, and how to break the force of that rebuttal is the one thing first in hand. The popular reverence for the Constitution as it stands largely in the way of any direct accomplishment of that object; and so through indirect effort the end must be sought. THE INDEX has shown that the indirect Bible clause of the school amendment would have effected that end. Many another indirection will accomplish it just as well. One severed link makes a broken chain as soon as another. Whatever gives the Christian scheme a foothold in the National Constitution gives it command of the whole structure. Its absolute secular entirety is gone, and its defence of secular rights goes with it. There cannot be a too diligent watchfulness nor a too diligent exposure of every step of that invasion, however indirect and covert it may be. That watchfulness and exposure cannot be had without organization to keep the public mind alert and active both to watch and to do. No individual voice or pen can reach all over the land to instruct or expose. It is only by organized cooperation that the work can be done thoroughly and completely.

Another consideration follows on the heels of this. It is evidently the purpose of the Christian movement to effect, if possible, an invasion of the Constitution before the public mind can be thoroughly aroused against it. At a recent local meeting held in the interests of the movement, a speaker confessed it as his conviction that, if the sentiment at large in the country could find expression, it would demand the withdrawal of the Bible from the public schools. The point to be enforced by that confession was that the Bible should be securely established there by enacted law before such sentiment found expression. Every delay of organization of liberals delays the expression of that sentiment, and so makes possible the success of that measure. Every consideration demands immediate organization. Without it liberals are weak and defenceless. With it they are strong with little to fear.

Organization is not an easy task. It cannot be effected without a cost of time, labor, and money; and oftentimes, where the liberal sentiment is weak and the opposite strong and prevailing, cannot be effected without cost of reputation and social standing. But the difficulties in the way only add urgency to the necessity of immediate action. The liberal cause will not gain strength by inaction, while social pressure and other obstacles in the way of organization are likely to grow stronger and stronger by every delay. The weak need the help of the strong in this enterprise, and at whatever cost; but one thing in right and reason remains for liberals to do. That is, to join hands in a common cause and for a common defence all round the land.

BULGARIAN ATROCITIES.

THE RESULT OF CHRISTIAN CRUELTY TO MOHAMMEDANS.—THE THREE GREAT RACES AND THEIR RELATIONS.

Rev. Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, who has been for a number of years identified with the missionary cause in various parts of the Turkish Empire, including Bulgaria, and who has therefore had good opportunities to use his faculties as a keen observer of events, is now in Boston, and talks freely and frankly of affairs in the East of Europe, as well as of the political attitude of the three great races of that section of the globe towards one another. In a conversation a day or two ago he threw some light upon the Bulgarian atrocities, committed in the early part of the summer, which, in the interest of fair play to all concerned, it may not be amiss to record for general information. He says these atrocities could in no sense be set down as the immediate consequences of religious fanaticism on the part of the Mohammedans, but rather the result of remote causes combined in the subjugation and expatriation of the mountaineers of the Caucasus by the Russian government. After a most gallant resistance of some thirty years to the immense power of Russia, the brave Circassians were at length subjugated, and, about the years 1862 or 1863, from five hundred thousand to six hundred thousand of these people—men, women, and children—departed from Bulgaria, determined never to submit to Russian rule,—driven into exile by merciless conquerors. It is said that by the time these unfortunate people reached the western shore of the Black Sea, fully one-half their number had succumbed to the disease and hardships incident to that movement. They were Mohammedans, and had learned by bitter experience what Russian intolerance meant, and with them Russian intolerance was synonymous with Christian intolerance. The Russians had surrounded parties of them with troops, forced them into lakes and other waters, where the Greek priests seized on and immersed them in baptism, and then hung crosses on their necks as a token of conversion. But such forced change did not work conviction in the minds of these people, but rather embittered them against all Christians.

The remnants of the expatriated Circassians settled in Bulgaria, where the Turkish government gave them lands, agricultural implements, and in other ways assisted them to supply their immediate wants and make provision for the future. It is true some of these new-comers may have taken to robbery as a means of subsistence, and the wonder is that there was not more of that kind of work carried on by men rendered desperate by oppression and starvation. The Circassians are naturally a hardy, brave, and warlike people, while the people among whom they settled were averse to war, peaceably inclined, and more agricultural in their tastes than anything else. But they were Greek Christians, and as such, in common with most people holding the same doctrines, were in sympathy with nearly all Russian intrigues having for their object the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. The fact of the Russian political and religious systems being so closely allied, and even identified, has always made it easy work for that great nation to keep alive a spirit of discontent among the heterogeneous peoples composing the Turkish Empire, and to use the same in furtherance of her known object of subjugation and absorption. Russia, to make the pursuit of her cherished policy one of well-defined regulation, appoints two sets of consuls for Turkey,—one having a business character, and the other political entirely. Her spies and secret agents permeate the whole land, and are all the time in active employment. The Turkish people are generally patriotic, but some of their leading men have no patriotism. This latter class may be said to be possibly, at least, in the interest of Russia. In other words, the men composing it form a very powerful element in favor of Russian designs and against Turkish nationality. It is the old idea carried out of dividing to conquer, and Russia would not hesitate for a moment to array Turk against Christian or Christian against Turk if it would further her designs in the least.

As the present war in the East is altogether the result of Russian intrigue, let us see how the Bulgarian atrocities are related to it. Simultaneously with the declaration of war by Serbia against Turkey it was arranged by Russian agents that, among other points, there should be a rising among the Christian population of Bulgaria. The more intelligent Bulgarians, and those who were conservative and inclined to peace—and these comprised the great majority of that people,—had no sympathy with such an enterprise, and even opposed it in a quiet way. But a certain number of the population, including the most wild and reckless of the young men, were in the plot and ready to strike when the time came. This time was set in May last, and was to be simultaneous with the declaration of war by Serbia. The time arrived, but the latter power failed to declare war then. The Bulgarians, however, not knowing of this failure, carried out their part of the programme, and raided on the unfortunate Circassians—the only Mohammedans in easy reach,—destroying about twelve of their villages, and killing some two hundred or three hundred of their people. This aroused the slumbering spirit of revenge against the Christians in the Circassian breast, and this warlike people, being supplied with arms by the Turkish authorities and told to protect themselves—perhaps in some cases being unofficially prompted to retaliate for the wrongs they had suffered,—rose en masse and made terrible havoc among the Bulgarian people, slaughtering from ten thousand to twelve thousand of them, and destroying from fifty to sixty of their villages. Thus, though but a comparatively small number of the Bulgarian people took part in or sympathized with the rising incited by the Russian agents, they suffered indiscriminately for that ill-advised movement; and thus, though the most terrible work of slaughter was done by Mohammedans, it was by a portion of them that had suffered everything but death from Christian brutality, and not by a people who lived as neighbors and merely differed in religion. If there was any religious fanaticism displayed in the business, it was on the part of the Bulgarians; but even they are to be excused when we know the agency which moved them in the business.

On the general subject of European politics Dr. Hamlin talks very clearly. He is convinced that the struggle which Russia has made for over eight hundred years for possession of the Bosphorus is not yet given up, but, if anything, more determinedly pursued than ever. The attitude of the other great races in Europe, however, necessitates greater caution in carrying out these designs. It may, indeed, be said that the conviction exists among the most intelligent Russians that only disintegration of the Turkish Empire will give the proper opportunity for acquiring the coveted dominion. Regularly organized invasion, they know, will encounter the united opposition of both the Germanic and Latin peoples, who would view in the success of any such enterprise a predominance of the Slavonic race that would be dangerous to the independence of both. Hence the efforts in another direction. But even were this not a serious objection to armed invasion, the state of the Russian government finances is such as to preclude the idea of any desire for war on the part of her emperor and his advisers. Therefore, it is assumed that, even while there is always a likelihood of trouble in the Turkish Empire and principalities, there is little immediate prospect of a general war taking place. The German peoples stand between the Latin and Slave races, and can, therefore, hold the balance of power between them. The Germanic interest is most intimately combined with that of the Latin race in keeping Russia out of the control of the Mediterranean Sea. Once give the latter power free access to this sea by her fleets, and she can control Europe. Her fleets could dash out at all times, and carry destruction to the heart of Europe, while the place from whence they would emanate would be remote and practically unassailable. This is the fear that will make Germany a unit with England and with the Latin nations in preserving the outlet of the Black Sea to a neutral power. Russian influence is ever operating to neutralize everything that England proposes to Turkey, and has thereby prevented many wise reforms from being adopted; but the struggle will only be thus prolonged, and the designs of Russia—if to be ever accomplished—retarded in their fulfillment.—Boston Globe, Oct. 2.

THE HERETIC PIETRO.

[The sketch which follows is based upon facts which actually occurred in Florence not long since. Such a society of protective Liberals exists there now.—J. L. S.]

In that fair city on the Tuscan plain,
Girt by soft hills and fields of waving grain,
Through whose old walls the Arno glides along,
Its banks reschoing with the glad song
Which from Italian lips comes blithe and clear
As flute-like music to the listening ear;
In fair Firenze, famed for noble men,
Who, skilled alike with chisel, brush, and pen,
Have given it most marvellous renown,
And shed rare glory o'er their native town,—
There where the dawn first broke on Europe's sight
After the gloomy darkness of that night
Which wrapped the world upon the fall of Rome,
And made for vice and ignorance a home,—
There whence the genius of a Dante sprung
To found in strength and beauty that rich tongue
Which now adorns great Ariosto's page
And Tasso's verses, and in later age
Held the keen wit of comical Goldoni
And the pure style of eloquent Manzoni,—
There whence arose the vast, Protean mind
Of Leonardo, who in truth combined
The painter, sculptor, architect in one,
Nor yet in music could be e'er outdone,
But shone alike in revelry at Court
And in researches of the deepest thought,—
There where immortal Angelo had birth
Whose fame remains unequalled upon earth,
Whose genius hung the "Pantheon in air,"
And whose Titanic statues proudly bear
The seal of inspiration so sublime
That it but grows more clear by lapse of time,—
In Florence, where Boccaccio sang of love
And Brunellesco reared his dome above
The checkered marble of that mighty shrine
Where grace and majesty so well combine,—
There where the mighty Galileo scanned
The starry skies, when by the priesthood banned,
Accused, and persecuted for the truth
Which now is learned by every modern youth,—
There where Cellini carved with silvered skill,
And great Giotto wrought in bronze, until Such gates he formed, so perfect and precise,
That they were fit for doors of Paradise,—
There whence the cunning Machiavelli sprung
And Andrea del Sarto, who among
The painters of the Holy group ranks high,
Amerigo Vespucci too, whose eye
First saw the main-land to which still adheres
His Christian name despite the lapse of years,—
In Florence where the great Reformer dwelt
Whose life was blameless, and whose tones could melt
And sway at will those fickle Tuscan minds,
Who yet could give his ashes to the winds,—
In this fair city, fruitful of the Great,
In times more recent, and indeed so late
As five or six years since, there lived a man
Near to the bank where lordly Arno ran,
By name Pietro, destined to a place
Among the benefactors of his race.
His was a noble heart and active mind;
A soul more generous one could scarcely find;
He was an advocate and used his skill,
Which was not small, to remedy earth's ill,
To aid the good, and help as best he might
The hard-disputed triumphs of the Right.
He had been born in Florence, and well reared
By one whom all the citizens revered,
His father, good Lorenzo, who 'twas known
Could make a violin of purer tone
Than any other workman in the town,
And thus had gained legitimate renown.
Lorenzo was no scholar, did not look
From one day's dawn to another in a book;
His labor well performed, he was content,
And went to Vespere, took the sacrament,
Prayed for poor Pio Nono in his cell
Devoted all those wicked men to hell
Who kept poor Pio short of wine and jelly,
And even prayed for saintly Antonelli!
But his own son, Pietro, mockingly
Scoffed at "poor Pio's" feigned captivity,
Laughed at the tale of dungeon, chain, and straw,
And asked what guard stood at the papal door
Save Pio's own Swiss soldiery in yellow,
Who made a show of guarding the old fellow?
Much worse than this, Lorenzo's heart was grieved
To hear his son declare he'd been deceived,
Deluded, duped already now too long
By those vile priests whose conduct was as wrong
As their false creed on superstitions based,
Which in all thoughtful minds was now replaced
By broader, nobler truths, by which he saw
How grossly he had been misled before.
It was in vain that good Lorenzo prayed,
And called the Holy Virgin to his aid;
In vain he strove to change his son's condition
And warned him that he hastened to perdition,
Hopelessly doomed to endless punishment,
If he turned sceptic and ate meat in Lent.
Pietro pointed out what bloody strife,
What reckless disregard of human life,
Had marked the Church's history and stained
The Papal annals, and what triumphs gained
By evil over good, what dark array

Of dreadful persecutions, from the day
When first the Church through Constantine gained power,
Came down the ages to the present hour!
Pietro was a scholar, and could read
Books which had shown him what a hollow creed
Was that which had been taught him in his youth,
And made him stand forth manfully for Truth.
The German language, whose harsh accents hung
Like heavy weights upon his Southern tongue,
He yet could read, and from it power drew;
He studied well its critics, and he knew
The rise and growth of doctrines, and the way
In which they had descended to his day.
He saw with indignation the fierce hate
With which the Church had struggled to abate
The influence of science, whose pure light
Had steadily dispersed the dreary blight
Of superstition's miserable reign
With long continued evils in its train.
Pietro was not silent. Long enough,
He said, the world had fed upon the stuff
Which priests had manufactured for its diet,
And meantime murdered men to keep them quiet.
He taught his liberal doctrines far and wide,
And thoughtful men came over to his side.
In time he stood the leader of a school
Detecting naught so much as priestly rule.
Unsparringly they criticised away
The myth-sprung stories of an early day,
The silly miracles of this decade,
The bare-faced frauds of relics lately made,
And contradictions in "old mother church"
Which gave infallibility the lurch.
The maddened priests of Italy combined
By every means their subtlety could find
To crush Pietro and his liberal band,
And tried to have them banished from the land.
But still, in spite of hate, the Liberals grew
In numbers and in strength, and overthrew
The plots devised repeatedly to crush them,
And spoke more boldly as men tried to hush them.
When suddenly their leader and their pride,
Pietro, sickened and in three days died.

Lorenzo's grief was terrible to see,
For he had loved him spite of heresy.
He was his only child, and ere his death
He prayed and pleaded till his latest breath
That God would yet be merciful and spare
An old man's son, and tore his thin, white hair.
But now the priests, like vultures near their prey,
Came prowling round that form of lifeless clay,
And gave out word, whereat the city started,
That at his death Pietro had imparted
To Fra Silvestro, much to his relief,
A recantation of his unbelief.
Great was the joy that now through Florence flew;
Religious bigots overbearing grew,
And said, "Did I not tell you? Ha! at death
No heretic dares render up his breath
Without recanting what he knows to be
A mass of wickedness and falsity!"
Pietro's form was carried in great state
With a vast retinue of small and great,
All covered with white gowns and holding tapers,
(Thus furnishing employment for the drapers),
To the cathedral, where to the great crowd,
Which through the service stood with faces bowed,
A Frate spoke. He said that the deceased
Had now from sin and sorrow been released;
That he had been well known as one who had,
When living, criticised the Church as bad,
Reviled its precious doctrines of the past,
And on their history foul slanders cast;
But, thanks to God! when on his dying bed,
And when around his unrepentant head
Good and bad angels hovered in the air,
Contenting which should have him as their share,
The good ones conquered and the man relented,
The heretic Pietro had repented,
Recanted all, believed the Church's story,
And, dying then, had gone straight up to glory!
Loud was the following murmur of surprise,
Frequent the tears in many women's eyes,
As the good priest concluded his harangue;
When from the crowd an eager listener sprang.
"I say 'tis false! This priest has foully lied!
No man but I stood by Pietro's side;
I held his hand and watched him till he died;
No priest came near him till his life had fled,
And I had gone away and left him dead.
Of just this priestly scheme we had our fears,
And we, his friends, had sworn for many years
That, when one from our number came to die,
We would prevent this monkish jugglery.
Lorenzo knows the truth of what I say.
He knows full well that neither night nor day
Did we cease watching by Pietro's side;
Therefore again I say, this priest has lied!"
Great was the tumult which at once ensued;
Loud cries resounded, boisterous and rude
Against the priest whose lying trick had failed,
For at Silvano's words the monk had paled,
And hastily descended in the throng
And through the priests in silence passed along.
The crowd dispersed; the greater part withdrew
To the piazza, there to hear anew
And question of Silvano all the facts,
And learn with horror of such "holy" acts.
The attendant priests bore poor Pietro thence;
And, though they knew full well their false pretence,
Rather than yield as guilty of the crime,
They marched beside his corpse in measured time,
And buried him in consecrated ground;
No "holier" spot in Florence could be found!

Silvano took Pietro's vacant place,
And the Freethinkers' numbers grew apace.
But from that moment always took they care
To guard against this miserable snare
Of baffled priests, who strive at death to gain
The power which they in life could not retain,
And thus by death-bed stories fraught with terror
To keep their poor, deluded flock in error.

HOLVOAKE (England), DAVID H. CLARK, Editorial Contributors.

REMOVAL.

On and after October 1, 1876, the publication office of THE INDEX will be No. 231 Washington Street, Boston. Office hours will be from 10 A.M. to 3 P.M.

REV. ZERAH MASTERS contributes to this number of THE INDEX an article on the "Organization of Liberals" which we earnestly commend to the closest attention of every lover of religious liberty. It is in our opinion marked by very unusual insight and the clearest perception of the present position of affairs. Do not overlook it.

MR. ANDREWS, in response to the request of Col. William B. Greene published several weeks ago in THE INDEX, begins in this issue a condensed exposition of his philosophy, named by himself "Universonology." Mr. Andrews is recognized very generally as an acute and able metaphysical writer, and his articles (which will be published from time to time as suits his own convenience and ours) will interest those of our readers who desire to be well informed as to contemporary speculation on philosophical subjects.

THIS is what the Nation of October 12 says of Governor Hayes and the American Alliance: "The Democratic papers continue to make a good deal of Mr. Hayes' letter to the American Alliance, and try to make him out a know-nothing, which is probably the height of absurdity. Mr. Schurz has found it necessary to take up the subject on the stump and explain that the letter was probably a mere 'routine' letter, such as every politician writes to people who say they are ready to support him, and meant nothing. In our opinion, the moral to be drawn from the case is a slightly different one from that drawn by the newspapers of either party. The American Alliance is a political organization which has been in existence for some months, has held a Convention and drawn up a platform, which has been published in the newspapers, and which we some time since commented upon in these columns. Everybody in the country, therefore, had notice of its existence and of its character, particularly every one in public life, just as much as every one had of the existence of the Woman Suffragists, the Prohibitionists, or the Grangers, when those parties were first set on foot. Now, under these circumstances, whether the Alliance has a large membership or a small one, or whether Mr. L. S. Tyler, the Secretary, is a real person or a myth, is of little consequence; but it is of consequence that any one who receives a promise from them of political support, should, before thanking them and promising them 'coöperation,' make up his mind whether he wants their support or not, and whether they ought to have the 'coöperation' of his friends. Presidential candidates have no business to write 'routine' letters accepting nominations from people they do not know anything about, any more than Congressmen have a right to give 'routine' letters of recommendation to people whom they do not mean to recommend. Any one who wants to be a candidate of the American Alliance can be so; but, in that case, it is his business to tell us so, and not first accept their support and then assure us that it has no meaning. All proceedings of this kind have a tendency to increase the present prevailing disbelief in the meaning of all platforms, party professions and principles, and are on that account demoralizing." There is too much truth in this view of the case.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

PERSONALISM AND IDEALISM IN RELIGION.

When the practical difference between Christianity and Free Religion (by which we mean religion freed from all bondage to mere will, as such, whether human or superhuman) is traced down to its origin, we find that the former derives its vitality from a person, the latter from an idea. It is faith in what is called the "historical Christ," or the "Man-God," which has made the Christian Church a power in the world; and this is a person, supposed to be historical, though in fact to a large extent the unsuspected product of imagination. But it is impersonal devotion to what is called law—the law of truth and right, as such—which is making the "noble army" of freethinkers more than a match for all the serried hosts of the Church; and law is only an idea, a reflection of the unity of the universe in the soul of man. Personalism and idealism in religion—that is the ultimate issue, as a fact in the religious history of the race.

Personalism in religion appeals to the imaginative, the tender, the social side of human nature. It presents a concrete image to thought, to be loved, worshipped, idolized, clothed with impossible perfections, set on the throne as absolute sovereign of the inner life. Protestantism presents one phase of it in Moody-and-Sankeyism, with its endless monotone of "Come to Jesus!" Catholicism presents a far more luxuriant growth of the same root in its Holy Family and hierarchy of saints and angels. In every form, Christianity is incarnation—the embodiment of the soul's supreme ideal in personal form. Here lies at once its strength and its weakness—its power over the emotional multitude and its powerlessness with the intellectual few. Resting as it does so largely on mere superstition and delusion, it vanishes in the dry light of analysis like a wreath of vapor in the growing dawn.

Idealism in religion appeals primarily to the rational and moral side of human nature. Where these faculties are feeble, it has a correspondingly feeble hold. It presents, as it were, the clew of a general principle by which to thread one's way through a labyrinth of tangled human relationships; it does not give a guide, but rather a map; it teaches one to save himself from evil by intelligence rather than to be saved by faith. But it does not end here. While personalism has its alternately flaming and fading enthusiasm of love for an incarnated Deity by which to inspire the believer to great achievements, idealism kindles the powerful and permanent passion for truth—a passion which inspires to achievements and martyrdoms every whit as sublime, and far more productive of blessing to mankind. All that concerns humanity here and now, with all its varied intellectual, moral, affectional, social, and other needs,—everything, in short, but the fancied interests of salvation from unreal catastrophes in another world,—is amply provided for by idealism in religion, and far more efficiently than the personalism which expends its highest potency on another life than this. Personalism in religion blinds the intellect to an external authority, and thereby to a great extent paralyzes it; whereas idealism not only stimulates the intellect to its highest activity, but equally educates all the other faculties in which this marvellous human nature of ours manifests itself.

This is a point of great importance. He who inhabits the world of ideas is always a foreigner to the Christian, and encounters all the blind prejudices, the causeless suspicions, the mean hostilities and disparagements, with which the untravelled bumpkin usually meets the native of another clime. Idealism in religion is commonly supposed to imply coldness and heartlessness, and to furnish no nutriment to the higher and more refined affections; it certainly leaves one without any Methodistical "love for Jesus," and therefore is set down as a sure sign of a temperament spiritually phlegmatic and fishy. Nothing could be more absurd. The religious idealist is just as tender, warm-hearted, full of the "milk of human kindness," and alive to all the mystic and poetic suggestions of this glorious universe, as the veriest personalist of them all. But instead of concentrating all his spiritual emotions in a delirious ecstasy of "Jesus-ism," he pours them out in the human relations he occupies to those about him. He is no bag-of-bones, juiceless and dusty. On the contrary, he finds in the exquisitely beautiful and precious ties of common life a deeper significance, a nobler suggestiveness, than can possibly grow out of religious personalism. Behind the mystery of human eyes is the mightier mystery of humanity itself, and this is to the idealist what Jesus is to the personalist—the Word of the Eternal Silence. The vistas of existence opened to the true idealist are to the "New Jerusalem" as the horizon of Tenerife is to the circumference of your back-yard. There is nothing in the enlargement of intellectual vision which even tends to dry the sweet fountains of human love and religious feeling; and the fears that science is going to kill out poetry, or that Free Religion has an atmosphere so attenuated that the spiritual affections must gasp in it and die, only show how impossible it is for personalism in religion to comprehend the idealism which includes itself and so much besides.

NEWTON-DODGE.

It may not be too late to say a word more on the Newton-Dodge case which was interesting the public three weeks ago. It will be recollected that Gen. Newton was the engineer employed by government to remove the rocky obstruction at Hell Gate in New York Harbor, and that he let off his blast on Sunday afternoon. The hour chosen was the hour of high tide when the danger from concussion and debris would be least; and the day was—not chosen but—appointed by the necessities of the case, the mine being just then ready for explosion, and the situation, being critical, was such that any accident from delay might frustrate the enterprise. If Gen. Newton thought of the day at all in connection with his experiment, he probably thought of it as an excellent day for his purpose; a holiday, when fewer vessels were passing up and down the river, and traffic would be little interfered with. For any excitement in the public mind he need not hold himself responsible. If people forsook churches and Sunday-schools in order to see the spectacle, or from fear lest the buildings might be thrown down, that was their business, not his. But Mr. Dodge thought otherwise. The sanctity of the Sabbath day was uppermost in his mind. He felt the choice of the Sabbath to be an outrage and a desecration, unnecessary from any point of view, and from a Calvinistic point of view wholly objectionable. The letter he wrote to Gen. Newton, narrow, supercilious, and arrogant, was the only sort of letter that could have come from such a quarter. The Orthodox community quietly assumes the divine sanctity of the Sabbath, and quietly assumes, moreover, that the dissidents from its belief are too few in number and too insignificant in position to be regarded. They do not read papers, or listen to arguments, except on their own side. With the mental condition of people outside of their own churches they are entirely unacquainted; the hum of speculation that is heard among the multitudes of reasonable men and women scarcely reaches their ears, and if it does it is unheeded. Nothing less loud or emphatic than Gen. Newton's detonating mines could penetrate their ears, and make them fully aware of the indifference that in many quarters was shown toward their superstition. That explosion fairly roused them, and Mr. Dodge's letter gave expression to the emotions of indignant surprise that filled their breasts. Gen. Newton's curt and insulting reply betrayed on his side an ignorance of the depth of the popular superstition, or else a contemptuous disregard of it, either of which must be surprising to one who does not consider how far apart from each other the protestant and the unprotestant worlds are. The letter warranted the cockles of the unregenerate heart. It sounded like a voice from the inmost recesses of rationalism. The radicals were delighted with the stern defiance of puritanism. But now it turns out that Gen. Newton is a Roman Catholic. At least, this may be inferred from the fact that he accepted an ovation from a Catholic association, and allowed himself to be congratulated by a distinguished company of priestly dignitaries, who were probably glad of an occasion to have their fling in an indirect way at the popular Orthodox precisian.

The incident is important as indicating the essential difference between the two Christendoms,—Protestant and Romanist. The two raise quite distinct issues with us. The Romanists are concerned about the supremacy of the Church. Their care for the Bible is that the reading of it shall not be urged. Their Sun day is a holiday, not in Europe only, but in America as well. In all countries where its influence prevails, the ceremonies of religion occupy but a small portion of time, and the rest of the day is left free for amusement. The Protestants are concerned about the supremacy of the Bible. Their zeal for the book devours them. They would place it in every room, in every steamboat-cabin, on every table; they would make the reading of it compulsory on every child. Their Sunday is the Hebrew Sabbath, without the joy that animated the Hebrew observance of the day. The two parties require very different treatment at the hands of rational men. The Romanist antipathy to Protestant bigotry is no sign that Romanists have no bigotry of their own. The Jesuitical reception given to Gen. Newton by no means implies a good understanding between him and his admirers and the radicals to whom Bible and Church are alike fraught with elements of danger to the constitution of republican society. For the moment the laugh has been turned against the Protestants, a laugh in which Rome and Reason heartily join. But Reason must not feel that Rome is any more its friend than before. Reason has simply two deadly foes instead of one.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY R. C.

At one time last week the prospect of an immediate war throughout Europe was sufficiently imminent to draw attention from nearly all other subjects. The six months' armistice which had been proposed by Turkey, and accepted by England and other powers, was rejected by Russia, which demanded a six weeks' truce alone. This demand was quickly followed by the report that Russia had resolved, in the interests of humanity, to occupy Bulgaria with troops. Speculation was centred at once upon the probability that England, Germany, and Austria would be drawn into the conflict which certainly seemed inevitable, and the possibility of which has not yet passed away. As we write, however, reports are less exciting. The English Cabinet has decided that England need not feel called upon to oppose a Russian advance into Turkish territory; and it is possible even that Turkey may accept the Russian ultimatum—a six weeks' armistice, to be followed by the "autonomy" of Bosnia, Bulgaria, and Herzegovina. In the mean time, fighting has been resumed in the neighborhood of Saltschar, with results advantageous to the Turks.

The effect of the war-panic was shown at once by a rapid fluctuation in prices at the commercial centres of Europe and America. Russian securities declined seven per cent. in the London market last Wednesday, making twenty per cent. in a single week; and nearly all other foreign securities fell in price, American bonds, however, holding their own remarkably well. In this country wheat rose rapidly, and there were sudden alterations in the prices of railroad stocks, grains, and gold. The excitement continued during a portion of Thursday, and then quickly declined.

In response to a call from Governor Chamberlain for aid, the President, through the proper officers, has ordered additional United States troops to be sent to South Carolina, to be stationed at various points, under the command of General Ruger. Whether Chamberlain is right or not in his supposition that rifle-clubs are forming throughout the State in order to interfere with liberty of voting, there are undoubtedly many lawless persons in South Carolina upon whom the presence of soldiers will act as a salutary check. United States troops have been well received heretofore in South Carolina, and while they are not likely to have much, if any, influence upon the result of the voting, their presence will put an end to the cry of intimidation, and prevent the threatened throwing out of the vote of the State by either House of Congress.

Some remarks which we made two weeks ago upon the condition of affairs in South Carolina called out, from "W. J. P.," an article entitled "Justice, not Partisanship," in last week's INDEX. That he wrote the article in a hurry is evident from the opening sentence: "I cannot let a day pass," etc. Had he been able to let a day pass, and had he reflected upon the subject a little more thoroughly, we are persuaded that some portions of his "protest" would have been differently expressed. But however this may be, we concur most heartily in the conclusion reached; namely, "that what the South wants to insure peace and prosperity is not government by either race as such, but government in which the races shall learn to work amicably together, and the rights of all classes shall be equally guaranteed and respected." It is because of our desire to help bring about this result that we welcome the reply of "W. J. P." as it gives us an opportunity to state more fully our present attitude toward the South Carolina negro. Our assertion that the Southern negro—by which, of course, we mean the average Southern negro, and more particularly, in this connection, the average South Carolina negro—has shown himself to be "utterly incapable of self-government" is contradicted; but the only proof offered is the statement that "each succeeding Legislature has been an improvement on its predecessor in intelligence and morality, and that the ruling party has been gradually sloughing off and rising out of the very evils that were the natural consequence of its sudden rise to power." This statement may be true; but when we remember that the last and consequently the best Legislature of all is the one which elected Moses and Whipper judges in the State courts, we contend that the improvement is so gradual that, to attain to the comparative respectability of some other State Legislatures, would require a length of time to be computed by geologic periods. "W. J. P.'s" "proof" fails utterly to have any effect upon one who knows anything of the character of South Carolina Legislatures for the past nine years. Let us illustrate this point. In 1869, when the above-mentioned Whipper was a member of the House, and Moses was Speaker of the same, there was a bet of $1000 between the two men upon a horse-race, which the House, notwithstanding the pressing business of the last four days of a session, adjourned for nine hours in order to witness. The Speaker lost the race and his $1000. Three days after, as the House was about to adjourn, Whipper coolly moved that a gratuity of $1000 be presented to the Speaker; and, with a full understanding that this was intended to reimburse the amount lost at a horse-race, the motion passed by a large majority. We have referred to this incident because we believe that it is thoroughly in keeping with and fairly illustrates the character of South Carolina Legislation for the past nine years; and to show also that when we referred to "the rule of the negro and his fellow-scalawag, the carpet-bag white man," we were not guilty, as "W. J. P." supposes, of "carelessness in writing." We admit that "scalawag" does not express our full meaning, for the reason that no single word could do so; but it does express our meaning better than any other single word could have done; and the fact that "W. J. P." considers it unjust convinces us that, notwithstanding his opportunities for observation, he has no adequate knowledge of what has been done by the negro in South Carolina Legislatures. In 1878—of the Legislature of which year we happen to have fullest statistics at hand,—the Assembly contained one hundred and twenty-four members, of which ninety-four were colored and thirty only were white; twenty-three whites represented the opposition, six whites being allies of the ninety-four negroes. As this was the sixth negro Legislature, and as each Legislature, according to "W. J. P.," was an improvement upon its predecessor, we have not selected the worst example. Of this Legislature, some of the members, says Mr. James S. Pike, formerly United States Minister to Holland, "were men whose costumes, visages, attitudes, and expressions only befitted the forecastle of a buccaneer." "Its intellectual level was that of a bevy of fresh converts at a negro camp-meeting." "Noisy riot," "chatter," "gush and gabble," are the words which he selects to describe its debates, "amid which the Speaker's hammer plays a perpetual tattoo, all to no purpose." Five preceding Legislatures had increased the debt of the State from less than $5,000,000 to a sum variously estimated from $27,000,000 to $40,000,000,—all public accounts being, of course, in inextricable confusion, and no one knowing the exact figures. The State banks refused to advance money for any purpose whatever, and bonds of the State had been sold at twenty-five cents on a dollar, conditioned upon the payment of eighteen per cent. interest. It was simply impossible (notwithstanding "W. J. P.'s" supposition of improvement in intelligence and morality) to get any bill other than a general law through this Legislature without heavy payments of money to a majority of the negroes or to their recognized leaders. No fear of public censure restrained them from open confession of bribery, for they were responsible to a constituency as degraded as themselves. When, for instance, a bill was up for a much-needed railroad charter, against which there was not a single honest argument, so that the white leaders dared not oppose it, the blacks voted it down, amid loud guffaws, because they had not been paid to allow it to pass. These rascals and their predecessors stole in every conceivable way, until taxation which was about $400,000 per year had risen then to $2,000,000 per year,—an apparent increase of five hundred per cent.; but inasmuch as property in the meantime deteriorated more than one-half, a real increase of over one thousand per cent. The intelligent white men who once made the laws for South Carolina used $400 worth of stationery per year, but these illiterate robbers squandered $18,000 worth; and all other expenses were in similar proportions. The school-funds have been stolen to such an extent that to-day, after eight "improved" negro Legislatures have come and gone, the Trustees of the Peabody Fund will not allow one dollar to be sent to South Carolina because they believe it would be stolen. South Carolina government, says Mr. Pike, "is the installation of a huge system of brigandage." The men who now have it in control are professional legislative robbers. They are in no sense different from, or better than, the men who "fill the prisons and penitentiaries of the world." And yet "W. J. P." is troubled by the "exasperating injustice" of the Charleston newspapers that "habitually speak of the Legislature as 'a gang of thieves.'" What else would he have them term it? And to crown all, let it not be forgotten that these thieves pay no taxes. Can "the rights of all classes be equally guaranteed and respected" while this kind of government continues?

We believe that the above described state of affairs should cease. As early as 1871, Mr. Chamberlain, then Attorney-General, now Governor, begged for the introduction of cumulative voting in order to "put into an ignorant Assembly, many of whom can neither read nor write," gentlemen enough "to shame them into decency or frighten them from crime." We admit that Chamberlain since then has labored for reform, but the doings of the last Legislature and the character of the nominations for the next one are sufficient proofs of his unmistakable failure. And now, let it be clearly understood that we admit the full force of the exceptions pointed out by "W. J. P." There are honest and intelligent negroes in South Carolina, and ignorant and dishonest whites; but the average South Carolina negro, we contend, is a liar and a thief. He is sometimes stupidly ignorant and vicious, and sometimes wide-awake and cunning; but in either case, and despite the possession of many good qualities, the inheritance of generations and the degradations of slavery unfit him as yet for the proper use of the power he has been exercising. On the other hand we admit that the average South Carolina white man is not an angel, but a very imperfect human being, with many glaring faults of character and temperament. Nevertheless, we believe that he alone can rule the State with any decent degree of approximation to the requirements of modern civilization. The opposition in the State, to-day—curiously described by the editor of THE INDEX as "Wade Hampton and his horde of murderers"—contains nineteen-twentieths of the respectability, wealth, morality, and honor of the State. Without doubt this "horde" contains some murderers and desperadoes; but it contains, also, all the descendants of the heroes of the Revolution and the children of the statesmen who argued with Webster in the halls of Congress. These men are struggling now against the absolute confiscation of the little remnant of their property, and for the redemption of their State from the despotism of brutal ignorance. The contest in South Carolina has nothing to do with the national issues which divide us into Republicans and Democrats. It is a battle of honesty against dishonesty, of the outraged against their plunderers, of civilization against barbarism. And, notwithstanding the sensational reports of Northern newspapers, there is no good reason for believing that the white man is hostile toward the black, or unwilling to treat him with fairness. He knows that he cannot do without the black man, but that they must continue to live together because they need one another. But they can never live together in peace while the artificial antagonisms resulting from the unnatural positions of the two races continue. If any well-wisher of the negro does not desire the election of Wade Hampton, and we accept "W. J. P.'s" assurance that in this assertion we were mistaken, it can only be because former philanthropic desires have not been rectified by the indisputable facts of the past ten years.

We desire to warn all readers of THE INDEX that Mr. Abbot must on no account be held responsible for any expression of opinion which appears in the department of "Current Events." We give this warning because we understand that some opinions contained in these columns have been referred to as representing the position of THE INDEX, or, more properly, of its editor. This is altogether a mistake, and we trust will not be repeated. It seems hardly necessary to state, also, that the "we" of these paragraphs is only the editorial "we," used from habit, and represents the single person "R. C.," whose full name may be easily ascertained by any one aggrieved upon application to the editor, Mr. Abbot.

ENGLISH SKETCHES.

BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT.

LONDON, Oct. 7, 1876.

You know that we have in England a certain notable divine, A. P. Stanley, D.D., Dean of Westminster, whose liberality is a household word among us. Dean Stanley's lines have fallen in pleasant places. His birth gave him the entrée into the highest circles of society, and his learning, culture, and great ability have vindicated his right to be highly placed, whatever his birth might have been. The Rev. A. P. Stanley made his way into royal favor, and he was appointed to accompany the Prince of Wales when that young "hope of England" was sent to improve his knowledge of the world by travelling in the Holy Land. Some of the sermons preached in these Eastern climes by the scholarly chaplain made a great sensation in England when published, and many angry cries of "latitudinarianism," "infidelity," etc., assailed the preacher. None the less did Dr. Stanley keep his secure place in royal favor, and the Deanery of Westminster was, in due time, bestowed upon the "neologian." The Dean of Westminster holds a unique position in the Church. He is subject to no bishop, and is practically independent. His abbey owns no allegiance to the Bishop of London in whose diocese it stands. It is a self-ruled principality, a little kingdom in itself. No position could have more exactly fitted the genius of Arthur Penrhyn Stanley. The studious scholar, the thoughtful writer, the polished courtier, seemed made for the gray, silent, majestic abbey. The Dean and the abbey made a perfect whole. Dr. Stanley is a small, slightly-built man, with chiselled features and delicately modelled head; manners most courtly, grace most polished, at once exquisitely finished and statelily dignified. As the beautiful and solemn abbey makes us half pardon the Christianity which raised it, so does its Dean make us half pardon the Court which has trained him. Why should not republicans learn this one lesson of monarchies, and emulate the graceful courtesy which gives a man the attractiveness of gentleness as well as of strength? So many good people seem to think that sincerity and bad manners are interchangeable terms, and that no one can be honest unless he is also rude. I confess that I should like to anoint republican life with the courtly oil that makes life's wheels run the softer and the smoother. But to return to our Dean. Independent in his abbey, Dean Stanley has become a very real power for good in the Establishment. Disbelieving in the Dean's creed, I must confess that he, at least, makes that creed endurable. No one capable of honoring genius and of admiring beauty can fail to yield some meed of homage to this Christian gentleman, who, believing that the Establishment and Christianity are both invaluable weapons for good, does his utmost to mould those weapons into modern shape, and to use them for the general good. Guided and strengthened by his noble-hearted wife, Lady Augusta Bruce—as simple-mannered and gentle-hearted a lady as ever breathed,—Dean Stanley has made his little kingdom a centre of good and purifying influence. In the drawing-rooms of the Deanery were welcomed, during his wife's life-time, all classes alike; and while the Queen and the Royal Family were no strangers there, a warm and hearty greeting was extended to the trading classes also. In a country where classes are so sharply severed as they are in England, nothing but the most perfect tact could have made tradesmen feel at home in the rooms where, perhaps, on the preceding day nobles had been welcomed; but Lady Augusta's gentle courtesy smoothed away all difficulties, and she was really loved by the varying classes among which she moved. When she died, after a long and painful illness, she was mourned literally both in the Court and in the cottage, and many a poor home in Westminster is the sadder and the drearier for the loss of her kindly face. One of the chief aims of the Dean's life appears to be the gradual widening of the English Church. He is striving to draw into it the culture and intellect of all religious bodies. "Inclusiveness" might be the motto on his shield. When the Revision Committee of the Bible was appointed, Dean Stanley held a special service in the abbey, and to the horror and anger of the Orthodox he welcomed Dr. Vance Smith to the altar, and actually administered the Sacrament to the eminent Unitarian. The Church papers literally raved at "the sacrilege"; but Dean Stanley went on his way unmoved. At the special popular services in the abbey, held in the nave, the choice of preachers has not been confined to the clergymen of the Establishment. Max Müller, the leagued Orientalist, lectured there. An eminent Presbyterian divine filled the pulpit. The outcry was something fearful, but sensible Churchmen saw that the Dean was doing more to soften the pressure of the Establishment than any living man. When John Bunyan's statue was erected, the Dean went down and unveiled the monument of the "dissenting tinker," and a High Church paper howled that they had better put up a statue to Satan and ask the Dean to unveil that. When a memorial was to be put up to John and Charles Wesley, the Dean welcomed the monument and the eminent schismatics within the walls of his abbey. All one man can do to make the Church "national" Dean Stanley certainly does, and a dozen men of his description would do more to delay the final fall of Christianity than all the preaching and praying in the world.

He works in the same direction with his pen as with his life, and publishes the most liberal essays. His volumes on the Jewish Church, on Sinai and Palestine, on the Greek Church, are filled with the most liberalizing ideas, and many a student has received from them the impulse which has carried him into scepticism. Men and women who would refuse to open an "infidel book" have eagerly turned over the pages of the Church dignitary, and the liberal thoughts have permeated their minds unknown to themselves, and have gradually leavened them with rationalism. Orthodox Christians may well hate the Dean, for he has, in hundreds of cases, undermined Christianity, and when people once begin to think they do not stop thinking at the point where their first teacher of scepticism stands. The third volume of the lectures on the Jewish Church is, just now, much afflicting the souls of the pious. Father Ignatius—an eccentric gentleman who wanders about in monkish garb, and bare-footed, to the amazement and delight of the little street-boys of this sceptical nineteenth century—has delivered his soul upon it, in a letter addressed, mirabile dictu, to the Rock, an ultra-evangelical organ, which regards Father Ignatius as one of the wickedest children of the Scarlet Woman on the Seven Hills. Father Ignatius writes:—

"Sir,—I have just examined deeply Dean Stanley's Vol. iii. on The Jewish Church, and arise from its perusal with feelings of horror, indignation, alarm, and disgust. How such a monstrous mixture of heresy, blasphemy, and atheism can be tolerated within the pale of the English Church surpasses wonder. Every blasphemy and blasphemer of the age is patronized by this Dean Stanley. Not content with insulting English Christianity by his public support of Mr. Charles Voysey, in the book before us he recommends most heartily to his readers the prince of modern French blasphemers, the hideous Renan!"

The well-known fact that Jehovah-Adonai, and that Adonai-Adonis, seems to have been stated by the Dean—I have not read his book, and Father Ignatius may be misrepresenting him to the utter horror of his clerical reader.

"And to show how Dean Stanley handles the Bible, I would for example advert to one of his labored deductions, whereby he produces a blasphemy that has no parallel. We know that the name Jehovah—for reverence's sake, written in the Hebrew Adonai—is hundreds of times throughout the Bible translated in our version Lord, in large characters. Wherever this word Lord thus occurs, it is, we are told—I shudder to write it,—Adonis; viz., a Greek Pagan deity, worshipped with the most revolting and filthy obscenities! Also under the name 'Thammuz,' worshipped by the Phœnicians, this revolting, disgusting god takes the place of the ineffable Jehovah; so that whenever we read in our Bibles of 'the Lord,' it is, says Dean Stanley, 'the Phœnician deity whom the Syrian maidens mourned on Lebanon' (p. 161)."

Clearly, Ignatius is not a scholar, or he would know that this "blasphemy" has plenty of "parallels," and is a generally admitted fact. Again:—

"The glorious doctrine of resurrection and immortality we owe not to Jesus our Lord, as the Apostles preached, but to immortal Socrates, the pagan philosopher, and his more pure pupil, Plato. The Jews first learnt the doctrine from the fire-worshippers, but we got it 'full outburst'—from Jesus, the resurrection and the life?—no! from the teaching, if not of Socrates, yet of Socrates' greatest disciple Plato (page 333; see bottom of page 336)."

And then Jesus himself: oh this wicked, wicked Dean; he says that Jesus was a man "full of sorrows, yet full also of enjoyment." God forgive me for even writing the blasphemy, the lie. Imagine our divine sorrowful Lord's life on earth being one 'full of enjoyment'! No wonder that Ignatius asks: "Is this terrible man to be acknowledged as even a nominal Christian much longer? Is he still to be allowed to sow his poison broadcast among Churchmen, Dissenters, and Presbyterians alike, under the influential title of the 'Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster'? This matter, most nearly affecting our Church of England as her peculiar disgrace, affects also the interests of all Christians, Protestants, and Catholics alike. Let all conspire to suppress this monstrous scandal to British Christianity.—Yours truly in Christ, IGNATIUS, Monk, O. S. B."

This letter is so very funny that I could almost suspect it to be a hoax, were it not that Father Ignatius is quite Christian enough to write such an one. The editor of the Rock adds a note to the letter: "As to the Dean, unless he can prove that he is not the author of the book which bears his name, he should be expelled the society of all believers, and also, which to him would be a far greater punishment—for he loves those who are in soft raiment,—expelled the Court."

If the Church expelled the Dean, we sceptics would be only too glad, for he is far too good for Christianity. If it were not that the man is, in himself, so thoroughly honest, it would be hard to believe him sincere, so broad and free a thinker is he. Yet sure am I that he believes his opinions to be consistent with the highest view of what the Church should be, and is honest in holding the position he does. So let the bigots rave against him as they will, there is no Churchman more worthy of homage from the rationalist than the Very Rev. Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D.D., Dean of Westminster.

INTUITION AND CONSCIENCE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I, for one, am very glad that you published Mr. Wickersham's interesting essay on "Intuition." It is in my opinion a subject that ought to be frequently and earnestly discussed until the truth in regard to it is thoroughly sifted and popularly understood. So long as the prevailing notion in regard to conscience and intuition is held, so long must there remain strong theological hindrances to scientific knowledge.

This subject of intuition, as well as that of conscience, has troubled my mind for years; and while my own thoughts in regard to them were too crude and indefinite to warrant me in giving public expression to them, I have looked eagerly for some one who could and would give expression to my ideas concerning them. This Mr. Wickersham has in a measure done, and I look now for some others to take up these subjects briefly and succinctly; for, as I am only one in the great army of investigators, I feel confident that in many respects the grooves of thought run parallel in all of us.

These subjects have not merely an interest as subjects of speculative thought, but they are also two of the strongest pillars of Christian superstition and theology; and science must be the Samson to displace them before it can pull down the whole rotten structure. To the theological and non-scientific mind, what is more reasonable than to suppose that these apparently momentary flashes of knowledge which we call "intuition" are special rays of light from the divine source of all knowledge, the Christian's anthropomorphic God? What more reasonable than to suppose that the "still, small voice" of the monitor and vice-rebuke within us is but the echo of the warning voice of a sin-detesting Deity?

It has been the habit of theologians for ages to point triumphantly to intuition and conscience as unimpeachable, irrefutable witnesses to the divine and supernatural origin of man. Like all the manifestations of physical nature whose causes were not at first understood by man, these manifestations of mind have also been ascribed to supernatural interference, as the easiest way of accounting for them. We have to thank Darwinism for giving us the key to these heretofore mysterious developments of mind, as well as for its more generally recognized work of furnishing us the keys to physical phenomena.

When it shall be demonstrated and popularly understood that intuition is but rapid and instinctive reasoning, a result of the inherited reasoning habit of our ancestors, strongest always in their descendants in the branch of thought to which by force of circumstances those ancestors had become most adapted, and that conscience is but inherited moral education, then may we hope to see superstition displaced and true scientific knowledge taking its place. Then will men no longer trust to the conscience and intuitions of the coming race to right the wrongs they do, but will endeavor to lay the foundations of the intuitions and conscience of future generations by building up within themselves the sort of moral convictions and habit of thought in which they wish their descendants to excel; then will men no longer ignorantly "build wiser (or weaker) than they know," but may have the satisfaction of knowing whereto their character-building tends in the future of the race.

Respectfully yours,

SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

MR. WALLACE'S LETTER.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Noting in a late issue of THE INDEX copies of the letters of Messrs. Lankester and Donkin concerning their alleged exposé of Dr. Slade, the medium, in London, I have taken the liberty to send you copies of the letters published in the Times by Dr. Slade and A. R. Wallace, F. R. S., replying to their charges.

As the phenomena of Spiritualism are fast assuming scientific importance, and have already obtained discussion before the British Scientific Association at Glasgow, it is but justice that the shallowness of such exposures as Lankester's should be understood by all lovers of truth. As an admirer of THE INDEX in its calm and unprejudiced treatment of all topics, and its willingness that all sides should have a hearing, I have thought a word on the other side of this question would not be amiss.

I also quote an extract from a letter of Lankester's to the Times, as a rare specimen of conceit and assurance, and also as throwing some light upon his rôle of exposé. He says:—

"The real question to be investigated in this matter is not, 'By what strange agency are these Spiritualistic marvels brought about?' but, 'How is it that apparently sane persons believe that the Spiritualists' tricks are marvels due to a strange agency?' The answer which all history and experience gives to the latter question is to be found in the existence of an unexpected amount of credulity and incapacity for observation, and of an unexpected amount of impudence and mendacity. . . . To convict the Spiritualist impostor, one must not approach him with theories based on recondite principles of modern science, nor should one put him on his guard, as though an honorable contest were in hand; but his habits and methods should be as minutely and covertly investigated as those of some elusive wild beast, and then at the right moment he may be seized and brought to the light, taken in the act." (The italics are my own.)

It is decidedly amusing to those who know of the large number of intelligent and careful investigators of this subject—among them Wallace, Crookes, Varley, etc.,—when informed that their conclusions are due to "credulity" and "incapacity for observation."

Dr. Carpenter admits that he was unable to detect fraud or imposture of any kind, the phenomena occurring in broad daylight. Sergeant Cox, President of the Psychological Society, testifies to the same effect.

If Slade or any other medium is proved a fraud, it will not be by such methods of Orthodox bigotry in science as this; for all candid minds, whatever their opinions upon Spiritualism, will admit its growing importance as a factor in the evolution of society and religious thought, and its claims for a calm and unprejudiced hearing before the bar of reason.

Yours for truth,

C. A. SIMPSON.

[Dr. Slade's "Defence" having been already published in THE INDEX, we append the letter of Mr. Wallace.—ED.]

LETTER FROM ALFRED R. WALLACE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES:—

Sir,—In the Times of the 16th inst., Prof. E. Ray Lankester states that I am personally responsible for the reading of Prof. Barrett's paper before the Anthropological Department of the British Association, and that my supposed conduct is "more than questionable." May I be allowed to show that this accusation (for such it amounts to) is wholly without foundation?

The paper in question was brought before the Committee of Section D by the Secretary, before which time I had never seen it. A member proposed that it should be reported on, but after a full discussion this was negatived. The paper then passed to the Departmental Committee, where it was again discussed, and, on division, was left to be read in due course. Prof. Lankester is evidently ignorant of the fact that the reading of this paper was decided after a vote taken in two committees, and he was therefore not justified in making the unqualified statement that "in consequence of the more than questionable action of Mr. Alfred Wallace, the discussions of the British Association have been degraded by the introduction of the subject of Spiritualism." As to Prof. Lankester's opinion as to what branches of inquiry are to be tabooed as "degrading," we have on the other side the practical evidence of such men as Lord Rayleigh, Mr. Crookes, Dr. Carpenter, and Col. Lane Fox,—none of them inferior in scientific eminence to Prof. Lankester, yet all taking part in the discussion, and all maintaining that discussion and inquiry were necessary; while the close attention of a late President of the Association, and of a crowded audience, showed the great interest the subject excited.

As I have now shown that Prof. Lankester commenced his letter with an erroneous statement of fact, and a "more than questionable" statement of opinion, it is not to be wondered at that I find the remainder of his communication equally unsatisfactory. His account of what happened during his visit to Dr. Slade is so completely unlike what happened during my own visit, as well as the recorded experiences of Sergeant Cox, Mr. Carter Blake, and many others, that I can only look upon it as a striking example of Dr. Carpenter's theory of preconceived ideas. Prof. Lankester went with the firm conviction that all he was going to see would be imposture, and he believes he saw imposture accordingly. The "fumbling," the "manœuvres," the "considerable interval of time" between cleaning the slate and holding it under the table, and the writing occurring on the opposite side of the slate to that on which the piece of pencil was placed, were all absent when I witnessed the experiment; while the fact that legible writing occurred on a clean slate when held entirely in my own hand while Dr. Slade's hands were both upon the table and held by my other hand, such writing being distinctly audible while in progress, and the further fact that Dr. Slade's knees were always in sight, and that the slate was never rested upon them at all, render it quite impossible for me to accept the explanation of Prof. Lankester and Dr. Donkin as applicable to any portion of the phenomena witnessed by me.

Yours faithfully,
ALFRED R. WALLACE.

THE PROFESSOR AND THE BISHOP.

WORCESTER, Mass., Sept. 26, 1876.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

I am not a subscriber to your paper, but I buy it and read it very often. It is not necessary that I give you my name. I can only say that ere long I intend becoming one of your regular subscribers, and thus help to forward the work in which you are engaged. But this is not the reason of my writing you these words. What I wish to say is this: Have you read the leading editorial in this morning's Boston Journal? If you have, why not insert it in your paper in the "Sanctuary of Superstition"? It is, as you will notice, an editorial in regard to Prof. Huxley and his recent discourses. These discourses, which have so lately been delivered in New York City, have been received with great favor (as you are well aware). Even those who do not agree with Huxley, have words of praise for him, saying that he has not attacked their religious faith in the least, and speak of him as a "perfect gentleman," and respect him for his faithfulness to what he believes in, and admire him for his patient studies as a scientific man. But Bishop Cox, of New York, has seen fit to pronounce the curse upon Huxley, even going so far as to advise every one to shun and avoid the Professor as they would an evil spirit. For this the Bishop gets rebuked by an Episcopal minister, who says Bishop Cox does not represent the entire Episcopal denomination. Now would it not be well for you to publish, side by side, the words of Bishop Cox and the editorial of the Boston Journal of this morning? Meanwhile, is it not refreshing to read those lectures of Prof. Huxley which the Tribune has now issued in pamphlet form, and would they not be good reading for THE INDEX subscribers? Pardon these suggestions. I only have written that I might free my mind on the subject to which I have alluded.

A READER OF THE INDEX.

TWO GOOD QUOTATIONS.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1876.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I take the liberty of calling your attention to the following extract from a sermon by Rev. Mr. Mundy, of Syracuse, on the "Secularization of God":—

"Sir Thomas More was at one time Lord Chancellor of England, and a gentleman who had a suit at law which was before him sent him a present of two silver flagons, hoping, of course, to influence the Lord Chancellor to favor him. The Chancellor immediately gave orders to his servants to fill them with the best wine in his cellar, and carry them back to the gentleman and tell him that it gave him great pleasure to have an opportunity of serving him, and that, when the flasks were empty, he would be welcome to have them filled again. Later in life the question came before him whether he would swear allegiance to Catherine; he could not take the new oath without abjuring his religion. He therefore refused, and for that refusal his head was cut off and put up on a pole on London Bridge. But the secular act by which he was true to the duties of his office, as Lord Chancellor of England, was as really the service of God as the religious act by which he was true to the duties of his religion. Faithfulness in office and faithfulness in religion are not separated in their principle; they are both duties to God. He who can be bribed to do injustice cannot have a title to any heaven to which respectable people ought to go, however faithful he may be in worship or in creed."

On reading the above, I began to question myself as to the reason why such a beautiful and suggestive circumstance as the one just mentioned has not had as general a circulation as that of the "little hatchet" of George Washington. Do you think that I am correct in coming to the conclusion that it is because Sir Thomas More was a Catholic? If that is so, what a despicable manifestation and illustration of religious animosity and sectarianism!

I also send you some remarks made recently by Rev. N. M. Mann, in a sermon delivered in the Unitarian church of this city, which I think deserve circulation at the present time:—

"A friend of mine says that, during a political canvass like that which is now progressing, he abstains as much as possible from reading the newspapers of his own party, and gives what time he can to the perusal of the opposition press. And what do you suppose is the reason he assigns for such a singular proceeding? He says the papers on both sides are sure to be filled with abominable falsehoods, and he is better pleased to find these coming from his political opponents than from his political friends. It is my opinion that there are a good many of the well-informed who feel the same way, and that the time has come when this insincere and miserable detraction, which is sure to be poured upon the heads of the ablest and purest men as soon as they are named for high office, will return to damage the party that uses it. There are plenty of partisan papers now which it might pay the opposite party to scatter as campaign documents among all the better class of voters."

If I may be personal, I will say that for the first time in my life I am undecided, not for whom I shall vote (for President and Vice-President), but whether I shall vote at all or not.

Your remarks on page 426 of THE INDEX were, I think, quite pertinent to the present crisis, and I hope you will continue to present our views until we be heard and noticed by both political parties. Liberals and radicals may be in the minority at present, but I feel assured that they have at least some political power already, and that they may before long have even the "balance of power."

If you deem this letter, or any part of it, worth notice or publication, you are at liberty to use it.

Yours respectfully, EDWARD LINE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—In the issue of THE INDEX of the 12th instant, the writer of "Current Events" said that—evolution or creations because we have not personally the means of testing and proving or disproving them.

The masses of mankind are compelled to accept almost everything knowable or unknowable upon authority.

Tyndall, Huxley, and Darwin may know that what they teach is true; but the thousands or millions whom they teach neither know it, nor know that the teachers know it. They can, therefore, only accept scientific truth upon authority until they are enabled to demonstrate it for themselves.

The theologian has the same advantage with the people as the scientist, as they both deal in what the people do not understand and must therefore accept upon trust, and each has reasons for his belief satisfactory to himself. Thus there is a struggle between these two that may continue for centuries to come, as they have existed for centuries in the past; and the people will continue to be led by the theologians until scientific truth becomes so well established that scientists do not disagree.

Theology and science may both be true where they do not contradict each other and themselves; but both cannot be true when they come in conflict.

Immortality may or may not be true. That we cannot tell how we shall, may, or can exist is nothing to the purpose; for a future life is no more mysterious than the present. Life of itself, whether animal or vegetable, is a mystery for which no scientist, whether materialist or spiritualist, has ever been able to account. "Death or inertia is natural. Life is miraculous." Our consciousness declares the reality of life, but does not and cannot declare our immortality. Inference from man's religious nature is the chief reason for believing it.

Being myself but a "philo-scientist" and a "philo-spiritualist," I am compelled to accept both upon rational testimony, but I cannot say I know.

2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER,

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers. The

TIME IS SHORT,

Before the vast interests at stake will be settled for years, by Congressional action; and the

NECESSITY IS GREAT

For unselfishness, boldness, and promptitude, on the part of all genuine friends of religious liberty and equality.

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND

Copies at least ought to be circulated forthwith; and the sooner the better.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1876.

WHOLE No. 358.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.
SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE EVANS (Colorado) Journal refers to the "Demands of Liberalism" as "the 'demands' of Atheism." That opinion is worthy of a wooden Indian.

THE PRETENDED "Sunday closing" of the Exhibition at Philadelphia is the Great Centennial Humbug, and excites universal derision of the hypocrisy of the Commissioners. Says the Boston Herald of October 27: "Three thousand 'dead-heads' were admitted to the Centennial grounds and buildings last Sunday. President Hawley publicly disavows all responsibility in the matter, and the public is curious to know who has reversed the decision of the Commissioners respecting Sunday admissions."

THE PHILADELPHIA Liberal League, through its President and Secretary, have applied for and received a charter from the National Liberal League, thereby entitling itself to representation in the Annual Congress of the latter. This is very desirable in the case of all the original Liberal Leagues and all other Liberal societies in sympathy with the general movement. The Philadelphia League has also elected its delegates to the next Annual Congress as follows: D. Y. Kilgore, Mrs. C. B. Kilgore, J. S. Dye, T. Phillips, and R. Wallin.

MR. UNDERWOOD writes from Chicago on October 19: "At Leesville, Ohio, a League has been formed. It will include the liberals of Connetton, New Market, and other towns, and I think will be a strong one. Mr. J. H. Holmes is President. The Constitution had been framed and adopted before I lectured there, but it will be changed so as to be in harmony with and auxiliary to the National Liberal League. . . . The closeness of the contest in Ohio and Indiana makes the excitement there so intense that I have deferred all engagements in those States, and come direct to Illinois."

PRESIDENT GRANT has again violated the proprieties of his office by issuing a proclamation appointing November 30 as a National Thanksgiving. President Jefferson's noble refusal to do this, and his dignified rebuke of a practice which goes far towards uniting Church and State, ought to be remembered as a lesson for all time,—an ideal of conscientious fidelity to the principle of secular government which is more and more despised by Orthodoxy in office. By degrees the cunning encroachments of the Church on the State have demoralized public opinion, and now nobody but a few "impracticables" protest against one of the most dangerous tendencies of the times.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us this droll bit of Scriptural exegesis, as an instance of the habit of ignorant preachers of distorting passages to suit their own ideas: "A South Carolina Baptist minister, desiring to impress upon his hearers the necessity of immersion, took for his text the verse—'The voice of the turtle was heard in the land,' and argued that inasmuch as the turtle had no voice, it must have been the sound 'kujank!' as he plunged into the water—thus proving a Biblical origin and authority for the practice of baptism by immersion." The grave question now arises whether a baptized "turtle," as a church member, is entitled to "open or close communion."

THREE THOUSAND people admitted to the International Exhibition grounds and buildings on Sunday, October 22! If any Orthodox advocate, in pulpit or press, hereafter quotes the "closing of the Exhibition on Sundays" as a precedent, it will be in wilful and flagrant disregard of the facts; and we give him fair notice that any such claims will be hereafter considered as proof of disingenuousness, hypocrisy, and "pious fraud." Let every liberal and sensible man remember that the formal vote to close the gates on Sunday has been repeatedly violated; and that it can only be regarded as toadying to a public superstition which the Commissioners themselves laughed at in their sleeves.

GOVERNOR CHAMBERLAIN's letter to the New York Tribune, October 25, proves to our own satisfaction the necessity of maintaining the freedom of the ballot-box by the presence of United States troops in South Carolina. He presents an array of facts and evidence which can hardly be set aside. The equal political rights of all citizens, whether white or black, must be protected, or the "republican experiment" is indeed a failure; no other issue can be paramount to this. When the "white line" is effaced forever, as it will be by the resolute suppression of all such wicked conspiracies as the "rifle clubs," and the maintenance of public order at all costs, the white and black friends of honest government can and will combine, and the dreary reign of rascality in office will come to an end. We wish nothing but happiness and prosperity to South Carolina, whites and blacks alike; but a "white man's party" in this country is an absolute impossibility, and the hope or attempt to create it can bring nothing but ruin to any State. The long misrule in the South by "thieves and carpet-baggers" can only be got rid of by political justice towards all races and classes and by universal education under a system of secular public schools.

THE Liberal Christian some time since published this estimate of Western Radicalism by a St. Louis correspondent: "It is wonderful with what ease some people obtain generalizations from very narrow premises. You will hear that the West is radical, given to doubt, and that the press is liberal, etc., etc. Now, the truth is that the Evangelical churches are the crowded churches, and the Radical churches are not crowded where they exist at all. The Presbyterian and Methodist churches are popular and everywhere. Out of one hundred and sixty churches living and working here, there are but two Unitarian churches. There is a mass of people who go nowhere to church in all cities East or West. But nothing is farther from the facts than to say the West is disposed to scepticism or radicalism more than any other section of the country. Neither radical nor conservative Unitarianism is gaining ground in the larger part of the West. It has little influence in shaping the religious opinions of the West,—so little that one does not like to think of it. The West is Catholic and Evangelical, with small squads of Radicals and Liberals here and there, but of very slight influence in the culture, or thought, or life of the great masses. This I think to be the real and unwelcome truth."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Theism.

BY DYER D. LUM.

In a museum at Bologna may be seen the skeleton of an Etruscan partly embedded in earth, whose fingers still firmly grasp a piece of rough copper, once placed there by fond friends to meet the demands of Charon and gain entrance to the realms of the blessed. Though we may smile at the superstitious faith which sought to gain entrance into another world by means of a bribe, and may despise the culture which regarded as equally real the spirit of the man and the spirit of the copper, yet to the simple Etruscan this was far from an idle symbol. The early freethinker who should have essayed to dispel the belief by appeals to reason, even if successful, would have achieved but a barren victory unless he had left implanted in the mind a larger and more comprehensive sense of his moral relations, and unfortunately this broadened mental outlook does not lie within the power of man to communicate.

All symbols of faith retain their value until outgrown; until a still broader symbol is attained the soul has need of them. He who seeks but to destroy the value of these symbols, who treats them but as weeds to be uprooted, who has no conception of a higher than a negative criticism, is a moral incendiary who conceives the absence of moral guidance preferable to what his "mental liberty" may deem erroneous guidance. Though men no longer have faith in the physical symbol, copper, as a passport beyond the gates of death, still the same underlying idea survives associated with certain mental symbols.

Two of these—the soul and a personal God—are the immediate objects of the present inquiry. Though the question seems one admitting of but sharply-defined statements (for God is or is not), still, however radically opposed the two sides may be, it is the imperative duty of the radical in his assault upon old beliefs to discriminate between their real and ideal values, and, while striving to show the unreality of the one, to seek to find new channels for the other—to attempt to lead the current of thought to flow in straighter and even courses,—in a word, to evolve rather than to create or destroy.

In primitive ages religion and science were one; every phenomenon had to receive from it its rational explanation; and the growth of a more correct or scientific explanation had to contend with and displace the traditional animistic, or "spiritual" explanation which the mind had received. Every extension of scientific truth had to be wrought out through conflict, had to be "made good," in the words of Tyndall, "through tribulation and anguish, inflicted and endured in darker times than ours."

The earliest science to emerge completely from this shadow-land of religious philosophy was mathematics, and the history of its growth reveals the same intrinsic difficulty overcome which we witness to-day in any of the present conflicts. What are numbers? Are they abstract generalizations, merely symbols of certain relations, or do they possess some mysterious inherent power? It is difficult for us to comprehend the mysterious properties once confidently ascribed to numbers, yet the Pythagorean school regarded them as the causes and principles of all things. "Three," says Cudworth, "was not only accounted a sacred number amongst the Pythagoreans, but also as containing some mystery in Nature." In the Hebrew traditions we discern the vague idea of intrinsic power in numbers, and even to-day, in Massachusetts, the lower strata of mental culture will stand open-mouthed before a seventh son, or a seventh daughter of a seventh son, the mere fact of the numerical relation being considered sufficient ground for a greater or less credulity!

The conflict between science and religion for the right to expound the physical universe has been a long and bitter one; and, although physics and the related sciences have effectually conquered, the idea of the supernatural still remains strongly entrenched in many minds, though happily, so far as contravening natural law, like its kindred idea, the Pythagorean Number, too far below the surface of modern culture to impede or even disturb the progress of physical research.

The distinguishing feature of modern scientific thought, and one logically following the conception of the universality of law in Nature, is the hypothesis that the universe has been brought to its present condition from nebulous matter by a process of natural phenomenal sequence rather than by creative act. Logically arising from this we have the evolution philosophy of the nineteenth century, whereby the conception of evolution has been extended to cover all phenomenal events, and offering a rational explanation of all the various phenomena of Nature by giving their genesis, whether physical, mental, social, or moral.

Natural selection, or the survival of the fittest, has effectually displaced the theory of design in modern thought. In Nature we might say that hate rather than love seemed to be dominant, if either were to be asserted.

"Nature, red in tooth and claw," nowhere offers us the spectacle of protecting weakness or of shielding misfortune. The survivor in the struggle for existence owes its preservation to the possession of some slight structural deviation which renders it the better adapted to its environments. Where this slight deviation from the ancestral type is in harmony with the requirements of existence, the struggle is by so much the less severe, a greater adaptation to circumstances results. This adaptation, however, can in no sense be regarded as a special provision of intelligent design, for it is as operative where the deviation from ancestral type is not in harmony with the environments. The term "special provision" may be as legitimately used where it involves a tendency to extinction as where it tends to the preservation of existence. Among many species of beetles increased power of flight has been of such obvious advantage that it has resulted oftentimes that the swiftest were most likely to survive and the slowest fall victims. As the survivors alone could be the source of the perpetuation of the species, heredity would preserve the modifications of structure following increased power of flight. As a result of the extinction of the slow flyers, we might say that the swiftest would become gradually "selected" to perpetuate the species until the degree of speed requisite to safety was attained by the species. But in some localities, as in islands, the high and enterprising flyers would be blown into the sea, and hence eliminated, leaving to the others the advantage of selection. Thus, in Madeira, of five hundred and fifty species, over two hundred fly imperfectly or not at all.

The beautiful verdure clothing the fields in beauty, decking the mountain slope in gorgeous varieties of color and shade, and filling the cultivated mind with ideas of harmony and adaptation, may well seem at first sight the result of intelligent design. But, alas! the wand of science dispels the fond illusion by its enlargement of vision. Each individual seed which has taken root and thrived has been but the successful victor where scores may have failed to obtain the required nourishment and consequently perished. If we find design in the whole, it must also be in the parts; and the design so apparent in the successful seeds is not more marked than in "the massacre of the innocents" which has attended the unsuccessful ones. The harmony of the landscape to human minds has led us to read design into the construction of its component parts, forgetting that the fancied analogy, if valid, would show but a limited intelligence working by methods which we should instantly characterize in any human sphere of action as reckless extravagance and unwise prodigality. The much-lauded order of Nature upon nearer inspection is seen to be veritable disorder, where spendthrift-wastefulness and a heedless use of means are as well-marked attributes of the Great Mechanic as the intelligence which they characterize.

Evolution is solely the result of mechanical causes. As Goethe long ago said: "The animal is formed by circumstances for circumstances." The only operating agent in Nature recognized by the evolution philosophy is molecular energy. Creation is never predicted of the particular, but only of the general. Each determinate thing is seen to have its determinate cause, and it is only the undetermined, the indefinite, the universe not as given in sense, but in imagination, for which an undetermined indefinite cause is sought. As Professor W. D. Whitney has said of language, we may say here: "That is no acceptable scientific explanation which calls in a special force at the beginning, like a deus ex machina, to accomplish what we cannot see to be otherwise feasible, and then to retire and act no more."

Religion, as "the sense of man's relation to the Infinite," being still held to embrace man and God after Nature had been wrested from her grasp, the contest became centred on man. What is life? Is it a mysterious force unique in Nature, or must this conception be abandoned? Step by step the advance has been made, and when biology had effectually displaced the idea of a vital principle as a distinct entity with the demonstration of its correlation to the physical forces, and shown it to be a functional process, the conflict became transferred to the citadel of mind. Has the scientific method triumphed here? Has man, mental as well as physical, been wrested from the domain of religious philosophy? If so, the question of a God may well be waived, for in that case, religion would but consist in an unrelated relation, equivalent to a negation, or (and mark the alternative) the old-time definition of religion and its province must be submitted to a thorough reconstruction.

Modern science, refusing to confine itself within the narrow limits set for it by those to whom it in nowise has been indebted for its growth, has not hesitated to bring its methods to bear upon the problem of mind. Although but few statements can be made in mental science not open to controversy, and many of the positions here maintained are still strenuously denied by distinguished thinkers, I cannot but regard the historical development of the science as indicating that the sceptre has finally passed into the hands of the associative psychologist, from whose stand-point we must take our logical departure.

We may assert that every mental fact has a physical counterpart, and the science of mind as imperatively requires the analysis and classification of these sequences as of those of consciousness. Through this method of research notable results have been attained. A sensation, so far from being an irreducible fact, when viewed from its physical side, is found to be a compound of elementary sensations, removed from the grasp of consciousness until grouped, so to speak. But how (it will still be asked) can these infinitesimal elements become a sensation given in consciousness? By what power is this effected? Instead of seeking to solve the mysterious connection of consciousness and molecular motion in the nervous system, science is indicating the identity of the two, that at bottom they are one and the same unique event; or, to use the words of Herbert Spencer: "Mind and nervous action are the objective and subjective phases of the same thing." Let us attempt to follow out this thought, and see if it does not offer us a clue to the asserted mysterious union.

Suppose a person, born blind, on reaching maturity, to have his eyes successfully operated upon and to open them for the first time upon the objects which he had long known through the sense of touch. It would result that his knowledge of an object through the sense of touch, and that derived from the new sense of sight, would become two independent sensations, indicating not one object, but two, until experience, or inseparable association, should reduce the two events to one. We stand somewhat in the same position; all events are known to us in two different ways, and necessarily appear double because we lack the experience requisite to perform this reduction. Hence we cannot assert that the physical event causes the mental event, nor vice versa, but that the molecular motion and consciousness are the same event seen under two aspects, the concave and convex surfaces of the same curve.

As in chemical reactions a new grouping of elements gives rise to new sensations, so in mental phenomena we have a somewhat analogous method. By the law of contiguity sensations and states of feeling occurring together or in close succession tend to cohere; so that the subsequent presentation of one tends to bring up the other before the mind. The rational explanation of this need not detain us. Through the inseparable association thereby established, the foundation of all knowledge is laid. Through experience and inherited aptitudes alone can the crude sensations give rise to images, which serve as framework for all ideas whatever.

The sense of power that we exert is an illusion by which we deceive ourselves to believe that we are something distinct from the conditions or environment in which we find ourselves placed. The grand discovery of the nineteenth century, the correlation of forces, teaches us that the various forms of force, as heat, light, electricity, etc., are not so many peculiar agents possessed of special activities, but that they are one,—that because, operating upon us through the channels of the different senses, special sensations result, the difference between them consists not so much in the nature of the agent as in the function of the instrument by which the sensation is effected. As objective realities we only know them as states of molecular motion; and only as relative to sensation, as subjective feeling; do they become the various forces of Nature. These special sensations we label with the words heat, light, vitality, etc., and by a natural hallucination deceive ourselves into regarding these symbols as objective entities. As a logical artifice of the understanding, it is necessary for the purpose of classifying our sensations; but we should not forget that the forces we assign to the mineral, the vegetable, the animal worlds, as well as the intellectual and moral, are but logical and not real differentiations. By the pernicious fallacy of converting phenomenal relations into entities, we create an imaginary world to which we transport our feelings, and from them constitute a gigantic ego, which, as has been well said, is man "writ large," and then make it our chief object to speculate on the relation existing between this verbal entity and ourselves. Nature presents nothing but molecular change, in the unbroken continuity of which our life is but a moment; but in the logical understanding it is presented as force, the special forces being but the symbols of the special sensations resulting.

We call heat a power; but what do we mean by these words? Science has demonstrated heat to be a mode of motion. Where the molecular motion, or the motion of the particles of a body is increased to a certain degree so as to give rise to the communication of motion to the particles of other bodies, we have power. The continuity of motion is unbroken; but, the sensation of sight showing us fire in the engine and steam in the boiler, we are led to call the one cause and the other effect, and the steam again the cause of the motion of the machinery. We thus see that force is not a cause in the sense of exerting or bestowing a mysterious power, but is an effect, and the supposition that it is other than the conditions under which the event occurs is a logical artifice and has no warrant in Nature. Force and its manifestation is one thing, not two; we personify one factor in the process, and, having isolated it in thought, view it apart from its connections as a distinct entity.

We are thus led to another point. Mind is not an entity exerting force, but is an abstract term, a symbol expressing the sum of mental phenomena; it is a series of successive states of feeling, which by a logical artifice we divide into separate faculties. This sum we mentally isolate and regard as the source of the phenomena which constitute it. So with thought; we raise it from a functional process to something distinct from the process. Through the gates of the senses comes all knowledge; whatever we know beyond sensation is by an extension of data supplied by the senses.

"Vainly does each as he gilds
Fable and dream
Of the lands which the river of Time
Had left ere he woke on its breast,
Or shall reach when his eyes have been closed.
Only the tract where he sails
He wots of; only the thoughts, Raised by the objects he passes, are his."

Mind is but an abstract generalization; so far from being a distinct entity and independent source of power, it is the most dependent of all the natural forces. Hence the ego, our sense of individuality, is but the residuum of all our former feelings, thoughts, volitions. We mentally extract fragments for the convenience of study and bestow upon them the name of faculties, forgetting that in so doing we empty them of all meaning, for the divisions we make in the web of mental events are purely fictitious. We are thus brought to the fact that intelligence is nothing but knowledge of relations, a comparison between the different links constituting the mind; all consciousness implying difference, we only know what a thing is by contrast with what it is not. My knowledge of a thing in its final analysis is purely relative, relative to my sensations.

"Nature is nothing! Her charm
Lives in our eyes which can paint,
Lives in our hearts which can feel."

My knowledge of oxygen and hydrogen consists in the sensations given. Each constitutes a specific relation: the one we term oxygen, the other hydrogen. Their union under specified conditions establishes a new relation, and this relation we call water. Although we are logically compelled to speak of water as a compound of the two elements specified, all we really signify by so doing is to indicate the establishment of a new relation; so, when we are told that consciousness per se is an irreducible fact, the statement divested of double meaning merely indicates that one relation cannot become another, and remain itself at the same time. As for purposes of study we classify these permanent possibilities of sensation as elements, and the new relations entered into as chemical reactions, so we subdivide our mental events by arbitrary distinctions, and use the terms reason, intelligence, will, power, and self, as if they were more than literary metaphors. To say that these transformations are effected by a law of Nature is merely to assert an observed uniformity of succession or coexistence between two phenomena, and, the conditions being known, the cause is known. To assert a power behind the event, not given in the conditions, is to be deceived by words. "Causation is change of relations"; our abstraction of one of the conditions as a cause, by a figure of speech, does not bestow upon it any objective reality. We thus see that intelligence has a definite and prescribed meaning, and to use the word in an entirely different sense is merely to juggle with words. Except as descriptive of a relation, it has no meaning, and absolute or infinite intelligence is equivalent to unrelated relation.

We find the ground thus completely cut away from any doctrine of personal immortality. An abstraction cannot "inherit eternal life" in another sphere of existence independent of the conditions in which it is manifested, or rather which constitute it. Mind unrelated to an organism, as an entity apart from the nervous system of which it is a function, has no more warrant in science than contractility apart from the muscular system.

The history of all conceptions of the future life, such as that undertaken by Tylor, in Primitive Culture, shows them to have their roots planted in experience and fed by the waters of ignorance; and scientific thought cannot regard its fruit other than as superstition. The Greenlanders regard with tender pity the poor soul forced to enter the other life in winter or in storms, lest in its toilsome journey it perish on the way and meet "the second death" from which no return is known; with a higher grade of culture, Christian theology conceives the apotheosis of sentimental faculties as basking under the smile of a pitying Father. This forms the highest conception of future bliss, unless it be indeed the more "advanced" view, set forth by F. E. Abbot, of "conscious unity" with the "all," an existence which can only be defined as substance without properties, or subject stripped of its predicates.—a metaphysical abstraction more refined than the Buddhist's Nirvana, but which, unlike that,

"Has neither beauty, nor warmth,
Nor life, nor emotion, nor power."

In whatever form conceived, in whatever language depicted, science can but look on belief in a future life as a survival, and, however much modern thought may strip it of sensible qualities, and idealize it as spiritual longing, a rigid analysis will still conclude that "soul-land," in the words of Mr. Tylor, "is dream-land in its shadowy, unreal pictures, for which, nevertheless, material reality so plainly furnished the models, and it is dream-land also in its vivid idealization of the soberer thoughts and feelings of waking life."

Whatever may exist outside of the realm of human relationship, we cannot determine; it is to us as if it were not, and in no case can that which is not phenomenally related be assumed to form a basis for any system of thought claiming to come under the head of knowledge. The law of association, accepted as the key of mind and followed out to all of its logical conclusions, leads us, notwithstanding individual dissent, to the conclusion that the world of matter and the world of mind are but phenomenal aspects of a phenomenal ego. In a strict scientific sense we are therefore led to define law as observed uniformity of succession or coexistence between phenomena. "If the events in Nature are complicated and changeable, what is called the simplicity and uniformity of Nature is not what exists and is observed, but what is constructed in abstraction, letting drop the observed complexities and irregularities. The invariability we find in Nature is what we have put there."

Forces are but modes of being extracted from the event and set apart by a mental fiction, forgetting that, in isolating them from the connected conditions, we empty them of all meaning.

Cause is the event preceding a specified event. Nature is a web of events, and in knowing one we know the cause of the succeeding event. The idea of power which we associate with cause is but a speculative instinct, fully accounted for by the law of inseparable association; and, in seeking for the cause of a cause, we seek for something not given in the specified relation. The thing in itself is the relation; the cause of the cause is another relation. Among the radical thinkers of the present day, a foremost place must be accorded to Francis E. Abbot, of Boston; and the earnestness and ability which he has shown in presenting what he terms scientific theism demands some consideration of his position in this connection. Mr. Abbot says: "Finding the spiritual in myself, I cannot escape admitting the spiritual in Nature." "Nature must be intelligent, or she could not bring forth intelligent beings. The fountain cannot rise above its source. In this manner the very existence of man as an intelligent being seems to prove that Nature herself is intelligent." And again: "Whoever denies a universal intelligence seems to me involved in greater difficulties than he who affirms it. For he is bound to explain how a thinking being like man can be evolved out of absolutely unthinking matter."

Without pausing to consider whether the onus probandi rightfully rests upon the assertor of a God, or upon him who denies the validity of the arguments presented, we come at once to the issue. We have seen the how of an event fully explained in giving its conditions; why the relation is what it is and not some other, is an idle question. To assert a radical distinction between mental and physical forces is a begging of the question. On the other hand, to assert their unity, and from this to infer intelligence underlying all force, is to be deceived by words and is not warranted by the facts. If mental force be correlated to other modes of force, its manifestation under stated conditions is all that can be assumed. If Mr. Abbot means by force something not given in the conditions, if his intelligent force or power is something over and above its manifestation, he is assuming distinctions not warranted by science, arriving at conclusions beyond the data of experience. The real question still remains. Is mind more than phenomenal relations? Mr. Abbot's inferences and assumptions are not to the point.

We find expectation, hope, aspiration, in man, constituting an essential portion of the world of mind; what is true of the whole must hold good in relation to its parts. Do they also exist then in that assumed source from which our intelligence is supposed to have been derived? We have as much right to abstract hope from its conditions as we have any other aspect of the case, or the sum of the aspects; at all events we have no right to suppress this important element in intelligence. When we analyze intelligence into its different aspects, or "faculties," we find them each and all, like hope, built up by inseparable association; results, not causes; functions, rather than entities. Can we abstract any of these from Mr. Abbot's "universal consciousness" with justice? We cannot discriminate; "universal consciousness" asserts universal reason and universal hope. The reason we use in deciding the problems of our life is but a reflection, then, of the reason exercised by Nature in the problems of universal life, and the hope which lights our path—and to which we owe the grand conception of humanity, its crowning glory—must also exist and throb with every pulsation of the mighty heart of Nature. Universal consciousness is as inconceivable as limit to space; but limits are not assignable to space, because to conceive a limit is to enter upon a new relation by which space would become something else, for which we have no warrant in experience. In like manner consciousness transcending the limits in which alone we know it, becomes no longer consciousness, but something else for which we have no name, have no conception, hence no place in scientific thought. Mr. Abbot, having mentally abstracted one of the bundle of functions known as mind as object, and constituting of the remainder the subject, points triumphantly to their union as evidence of unrelated consciousness; and upon this fiction rests one of the pillars of his scientific theism! "Where the consciousness of God is," says Feuerbach, "there is the being of God,—in man, therefore; in the being of God it is only thy own being which is an object to thee, and what presents itself before thy consciousness is simply what lies behind it."

Mr. Abbot, while admitting that "molecular changes or rearrangements in the great nerve ganglia" "are the conditions of thought," denies "absolutely" that they even begin to explain human thought itself. While recognizing the essential unity of matter and mind as the twofold aspect of the same thing, he asserts for them in the phenomenal world a dual existence, relegating the asserted unity to the realms of the unrelated. Science does not attempt to transcend the interrelation of phenomena; to seek to venture beyond or outside phenomena is to try to pass the bounds of experience, hence inadmissible. The fallacy of regarding logical distinctions as real differentiations lies at the root of this method of reasoning. Scientific theism, having its roots solely in metaphysical soil, leads Mr. Abbot indignantly to deny the relativity of knowledge. The habit of raising oneself, figuratively speaking, by the intellectual waistbands to a stand-point outside of phenomenal relations may be a method of mental gymnastics having its value; but from the examples given of the extension of the horizon of the senses from the lofty heights of imagination on these occasions, we cannot but regard the custom as one calculated to confuse the mind in dealing simply with the relations presented by mundane experience, with which alone we profess to deal.

We are, therefore, not surprised to find Mr. Abbot drawing in Nature an arbitrary and hypothetical line between the "moral and non-moral forces." The assumption of higher and lower forces in Nature, and of our being "bound to explain how a thinking being like man can be evolved from unthinking matter," are false statements of the question, which only serve still further to complicate us in the meshes of metaphysical illusion. What Mr. Abbot so confidently terms "unthinking matter" is, upon final analysis, found to be a set of human sensations, actual or inferred; why these exist is an absurd question, known only to the mental gymnastics we have described; and what is seen over and above them not explained in their conditions is only a metaphysical entity which Mr. Abbot, having constructed, calls upon us to explain. There is no higher or lower in Nature. What we find in Nature is a series of events known to us through the relationship established by the senses. We have seen that force and power are but words used to describe events, and indicate a logical distinction only, not existing in Nature, but only in the universe as given in thought, and from thence reflected back upon Nature. Mr. Abbot, in accepting logical distinctions as objective facts, is confounding the ideal constructions of thought with the facts of sense, thereby introducing unnecessary factors into the problem; and these interjected factors constitute the mystery we are "bound to explain"!

We have no more warrant for assuming "moral and non-moral forces" in Nature than we would have in ascribing objective existence to social and non-social forces; or, if distinctions in thought are differentiations in Nature, why not natural and non-natural forces? The distinction made by Mr. Abbot is purely fictitious, and the alleged "unity" upon which he relies for a basis to erect a scientific theism, postulating a "universal consciousness" "infinitely more than person," is upon final analysis nothing more than a harmony and an effect. Asserting that "freedom from all that implies finitude or limitation of any kind is an essential part of a worthy idea of God," he does thereby remove it from the objective to the subjective; existing not as fact, but as ideal.

Mr. Abbot's pantheistic realism being so little in accordance with the requirements of scientific thought, we are not surprised to find him endorsing transcendental views as vague as the intuitionism he rejects. Ignoring the crowning glory of modern psychology in showing that organized experiences produce forms of thought, he argues from the forms of thought to assert for man the possession of a special "susceptibility to spiritual impressions from external Nature." Wherein lies the essential difference between this "susceptibility" and the intuition of the transcendentalist? Intuition, faith, or susceptibility, in so far as they are special "faculties," are but different names for what at its root is one, different forms of the same underlying idea. As Schelling denied the right of the man not in possession of intellectual intuition to dispute the conclusions asserted by him to be intuitively perceived, so Mr. Abbot might deny my right to dispute the validity of his conclusions upon the ground of my confessed ignorance of the requisite "susceptibility" through which he is enabled to discern love in objective Nature. Though he does not explicitly take this ground, still he impliedly adopts it by saying: "From physical data no sagacious mind will expect to draw any but physical conclusions; but physical data are utterly inapplicable in the treatment of moral problems, and have no force when opposed to moral conclusions." This contemptuous denial of the validity of scientific methods, and assertion of a metaphysical province transcending that of science, is part and parcel of a scientific theism. Matthew Arnold says that "man has a thousand gifts." While his "susceptibility" may lead him to regard them as veritable entities in Nature, his reason, trained in the methods of scientific thought, would reprove him when—

"The generous dreamer invests
The senseless world with them all."

The "higher teleology" to which Mr. Abbot refers need not detain us. Professor Fiske has well expressed the teaching of the evolution philosophy by saying: "It is not the intelligence which has made the environment, but it is the environment which has moulded the intelligence. In the mind of Nature the coin mind has been stamped; and theology, perceiving the likeness of the die to its impression, has unwittingly inverted the causal relation of the two, making mind, archetypal and self-existent, to be the die." The "higher" or broader view taken by Mr. Abbot is that taken from the stand-point already discussed, to which giddy height science confesses its inability to rise.

"It has sometimes occurred to us," says a writer in a recent number of the Westminster Review, "that, in all human guesses at the insoluble problem of the causation of phenomena, we perhaps inevitably attach too high importance to intelligence and conscious will, because under the different differentiations which limit our being it is only through their agency that we can accomplish anything. It is as though the eye were to fancy the other portions of the body impotent because they could not see." Leaving the reader to carry out the thought suggested to its various applications, we will take leave of scientific theism by recalling the words of J. S. Mill, where he evidently had some kindred system in view: "The root of all a priori thinking is the tendency to transfer to outward things a strong association between the corresponding ideas in our own minds; and the thinkers who most sincerely attempt to limit their beliefs by experience, and honestly believe that they do so, are not always sufficiently on their guard against this mistake."

In denying these time-honored dogmas any place in positive knowledge, have we ground left for the perpetuation of religion? Can that be the coming religion in which no room is left for these ideas? Whatever man and Nature may have been supposed to be, what they are is in nowise affected by the fall of these theories.

Many a school-boy is a far better mathematician or mechanician than the wisest of the Greeks, because he has had but to assimilate what they wrought out. The fund of knowledge has been continually augmented through countless channels, and not only have we thus preserved the result of ages of thought and endeavor, but the experience of the individual thus wrought out became registered, and is seen to-day as "improved faculties" for using and adding to the general fund. In the interpretation of Nature we have to use symbols, which we may compare to a currency. The mind uses a currency, having its value from the perceptions upon which it is based. Man uses a far higher currency than the animal, but the perception and the conception are both alike reducible to the same fundamental fact; images and ideas are both based upon states of feeling.

Language opens to man a universe unknown to the animal; the interrelated worlds of society, art, poetry, separate him from the lower orders by an impassable gulf; and it is from these worlds, the worlds of thought, rather than from Nature, that man acquires his value as a moral being. "Entre l'homme et le monde il faut l'Humanité," said Comte. The reduction of ideas to their concretes lies in the province of science; but, by the reverse process of rising from what Herbert Spencer terms the "raw material of consciousness" to the ideal world, we find ourselves transported to new relations. The glory of the ideal has manifested itself through all previous religions, and, however obscured by superstitions, or seemingly buried in realistic creeds, has ever constituted the living element which rendered them so acceptable to the hearts of their followers. While the understanding constructed dogmas, the emotions, concerned less with methods than with aims, sought in the ideal for a law of guidance.

More than a generation has passed since Carlyle asserted that mankind were suffering from "spiritual paralysis," and with bitter scorn and fierce invective denounced the various "Morrison's Pills" which were offered by reformers, in the vain hope to resuscitate the body politic and introduce a millennial era. Although a generation has passed away, and new hands are everywhere discernible, guiding, or assuming to guide, the course of events, still we may discern as clearly as ever that "spiritual paralysis" remains unchecked.

Men who have no clear vision of the ideal before which they bend with awe and reverence, who seem to humiliate themselves before a high standard of duty, and hear only the voice of expediency, have no occasion to be surprised that we are now reaping the harvest where they have so seedulously sown. Notwithstanding the open contempt with which radicals view the efforts of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, I cannot but regard the vital animating spirit of the movement as far deeper than the jar and jangle of the various schools over methods, as in fact, a renewed assertion of the all-importance of the ideal. It is the glory of the human that he alone of all animate existence can rise above the world of perception; that he can paint upon the canvas of his mind an ideal to which he can turn in his better moments for consolation, inspiration, and aid. To enable men to construct this ideal is the office of religion, and so far as Mr. Moody leads the unthinking and indifferent to form such an ideal, with whatever superstitions it may be clouded, or with what "sensationalism" presented, still there will shine through a bright halo infinitely more precious than the practical materialism it has supplanted, and of far higher value than the flippant and shallow criticisms of so many apostles of freethought. Whatever Mr. Moody may think of the value of the means he uses, it is the ends sought that contain the secret of his success. It is the appeal of an earnest, thoughtful man, who, however unconsciously, regards the ideal as of transcendent importance over things of sense; a call to that within us all which excites aspiration towards something higher, better, nobler, than we have yet realized in experience.

The creed of the future, resting upon a scientific basis, must carefully discriminate between facts as real or ideal, and strenuously insist that the denial of the validity of the evidence of God's objective existence but emphasizes more distinctly the ideal value of the conception. An argument, however elaborate, tending to demonstrate the unreality as objective existences of poetical figures might be logically unassailable; yet what would it avail against the true value of poetry? Intellectual doubt or conviction can never arouse to action, and only when religion is as completely divorced from external reality as is poetry, can its development as an emotional force proceed free from superstitions to man's truest happiness.

"God," say Feuerbach, "is for man the common-place book where he registers his highest feelings and thoughts." The craving of the understanding for objective existence is met by identifying this "common-place book" with the ideal world of moral relations—the outgrowth of social life,—in a word, humanity. "All that we are," said Buddha, "is the result of what we have thought." All that men have thought, the aggregate of past thought, the Buddhist Karma, or modern humanity, becomes the first cause, the divine source from which man derives his idea of duty, the feeling of obligation; from this arises the conception of moral perfection arousing to action, to imitation, and, contrasting therewith our own shortcomings, we may well bow our heads in the deepest contrition.

In its subjective aspect, we have an ideal aim, before which man's emotional nature may well lead him to bow his head in humility, when he considers how often and how great are his falls from its requirements.

In the name of the highest ideal of duty, we call upon those who so superciliously sneer at the Christian "Evangelists," or who mournfully deprecate their lack of culture, to endeavor earnestly to present mankind with higher or clearer ideals, to set before men a standard of duty less objectionable to the "cultured taste," and freed from the "superstitions" they deplore, which will prove of service to human hearts filled with a sense of their shortcomings. By the negative process with which we are all so familiar, we may frequently accomplish even more evil than good; for, however successful we may be in liberating a mind from its mental bondage to the authority of a Moses, a Jesus, or a Mohammed, if the so-called liberation is from both aspects, the historical belief and its ideal value, leaving the mind without either, our success is rather an utter failure. This essential distinction must be fully perceived and clearly stated, and the ideal preserved; otherwise the coming religion will remain but a dream.

But the prophet of the ideal has yet to come. Here and there one has arisen who has painted its beauty and sounded its praises in glowing words; but alas, his theism has ever led him to look in opposite directions for his inspiration; his vision never grew distinct, and his efforts were frittered away in fruitless tasks.

Mr. Abbot has defined religion as the "effort of man to perfect himself in all of his relations," using the word, as is evident, in its broadest sense to cover every effort of mankind to perfect their condition intellectually, morally, and socially. For my part, I cannot but regard this definition as too comprehensive, straining the office of religion from its rightful use as a force tending to the elevating of the emotions and development of character to embrace what may be more especially designated in other relations. Although by this definition the savage and barbarous races are denied the possession of religion, I would prefer to still further restrict its meaning by defining it as the effort of a human being to attain ideal perfection, believing that this statement would more clearly express its central truth, the need of personal consecration to the attainment of the ideal; that however we may perfect ourselves in other relations, in intellectual acquirements, in moral relations, and in social arrangements, they are all subordinate to the great pivotal duty of life,—the attainment of character, the nearest realization of our highest ideal of perfection.

The earnest soul, no longer seeking God in the past, or deifying himself by regarding him as a present aid, will place God in the future as an ideal aim. "Every man must place before himself a God; i. e., an aim, a purpose. The aim is the conscious, voluntary, essential impulse of life, the glance of genius, the focus of self-knowledge,—the unity of the material and spiritual in the individual man. He who has an aim has a law over him; he does not merely guide himself, he is guided. He who has no aim has no home, has no sanctuary. Aimlessness is the greatest unhappiness. Even he who has only common aims, gets on better, though he may not be better, than he who has no aim. An aim sets limits, but limits are the members of virtue. He who has an aim, an aim which is in itself true and essential, has a religion, if not in the narrow sense of common piety, yet—and this is the only point to be considered—in the sense of reason." [Feuerbach.]

The analysis of intelligence, the basis of morals, and the evolution of social growth, are matters for scientific consideration, and should receive profound attention; but individual reformation of character, the consecration of all our energies to the behests of duty and the sense of its obligations, are matters pertaining directly to religion. However valuable may be the efforts of reformers in their various fields of labors,—however essential to the perpetuities of our liberties may be our common school system,—however necessary for the continued progress of the human race may be the absolute separation of Church and State,—however requisite to self-government may be the success of the Liberal League movement,—still high above all these motives the resplendent light of the ideal, shining upon our pathway and unconsciously leading us to the realization of its beauty in the growth of character, must ever be accorded the chief place. However strenuously we may insist in the name of good government for equal rights,—in the name of mental liberty for freedom of thought,—and in the name of humanity for the reforms of social abuses,—still the instincts of Orthodoxy were right in according to man's mastery over himself the higher place; and while the coming religion will preserve all of the self-sacrificing devotion, personal renunciation, and lofty aspirations which have characterized some of its predecessors, its creed will recognize in humanity—the summation of spiritual endeavor—the highest type of Deity.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MRS. STANTON.

Mrs. Stanton has laid us all under obligation by the following spirited communication:—

ED. INDEX:—

In a recent letter to me from Judge Hurlbut, the first Vice-President of the National Liberal League, a passage occurs which I desire to quote, and answer in your journal.

It may not be known to most of your readers that, a quarter of a century ago, Judge Hurlbut, a leading lawyer in the State of New York, published a very able work on Human Rights, and in the chapter on the "Elective Franchise" proved, conclusively, woman's absolute right to self-government, to choose her own rulers, and to have a voice in the laws under which she lived. As many others share in the fear he now expresses as to woman's influence in the State, I desire to call your attention to the point he suggests, and thus draw out from liberal thinkers some opinions on this question. He says:—

"I do not doubt that, taking a new people for the first time forming a government—having no old institutions to lumber up their path, no priests, no nonsense,—woman's equality in the suffrage should be deemed a matter of course. But I have hesitated of late, under our artificial system, with imported laws, usages, religion—with a priestly power all-controlling, religion as yet being but the mere myth and poetry of the barbarous ages, and having a most controlling influence with the female mind,—estimating it probable that universal female suffrage would give the priests the ultimate power of the State."

And priests I fear more than I do their infernal saint."

Woman in her ignorance and superstition is to-day a dangerous element under all government, blocking the progress of science and reform by her blind faith in man-made creeds and false interpretations of Nature's laws. Man for his own selfish purposes has made woman more completely his slave by the subjection of her religious nature than in any other way; and, with the false creeds and dogmas by which he has enslaved her, she now with prayers and tears enslaves the race.

To avoid the danger of her subtle influence, felt to-day in all ranks of society, shall we limit her personal independence and knowledge still farther, and thus perpetuate the very danger we fear and suffer? Or by giving her complete education, freedom of thought on all questions, equal political rights, with the full responsibility of an American citizen, with the dignity, self-respect, self-assertion, honor, and honesty—the cardinal virtues that follow in the train of liberty and equality,—transform her into a power for good rather than evil?

Many bigoted Protestants oppose woman's suffrage because they say Catholic women, being under the control of the priests, and being more numerous than any other sect, would outvote them, and establish their religion throughout the land. The whiskey rings and German beer-garden gentry all oppose woman's suffrage, because, they say, the women would introduce rigid Sunday laws, shut up the beer-gardens and saloons, pass prohibitory laws, grant divorce for drunkenness, etc., etc., there being no end to the good and evil women would do, if they had the power. ~~But~~ as men do not cease to vote the day women begin to exercise their right, and as men would always outnumber them at the polls, and as the women would not be a unit on most questions, there is no hope of any reform being speedily precipitated by women alone.

As to the power of the priesthood, the most philosophical way to ward off that danger is to emancipate woman's mind from superstition and blind reverence for authority, from the dogmas, traditions, and mysteries of the popular faith, by securing to her a thoroughly scientific education, her right of individual conscience and judgment in all things, her personal independence.

The only reason why men in general have not done this long ago is because they were sufficiently clear-sighted to see that to emancipate woman's mind from the control of the priesthood was to emancipate her from man's authority altogether. "Thus saith the Lord," in the Scriptures of all nations, is the weapon man has most skillfully used, and still uses with tremendous effect, to keep woman in subjection. Having so entirely perverted her religious conscience that she believes her condition, whatever it may be, ordained of heaven, and opposes great reforms in science and philosophy because some little text in the Bible seems to forbid progress in these directions, is it just or wise for liberal thinkers to propose to clip her wings still closer, in order to limit her power for evil? What are men doing to lift the darkness and superstition from the minds of women? How common the remark among men of liberal ideas: "Such are my opinions, but I never talk of these questions before my wife. She is happy in her church, its forms, and creeds, and I do not wish to unsettle her faith. Religion is a great thing for women; it makes them docile and manageable." Yes, but unfortunately as docile and manageable in the hands of the priest as the husband; and the children in turn receive the impress of the mother's thought and training. Thus the false theology intended only for women are ingrafted on the minds of sons as well as daughters, who show their training in the persecution of those who are battling for the "new faith"; and thus injustice goes round the circle, and they who perpetrate the first act are in turn punished.

Woman's thoughts and interests have been too much absorbed in the Church; and to change the current of her feelings by rousing some interest in political questions is a strong argument in favor of securing her right of suffrage. With a knowledge of political economy, women would soon take far more interest in those great questions that involve so many practical interests of humanity than they now do in donation parties, church decorations, and theological speculations.

While in their ignorance woman may be more devoutly religious, more superstitious than men, those trained to thought have generally manifested more interest in political questions, and have more frequently spoken and written on such themes than on theology. This may be attributed in a measure to the fact that the tendency of woman's mind is practical rather than speculative. Questions of political economy lie within the realm of positive knowledge; those of theology belong to the world of mysteries and abstractions.

Again, the number of women ready for liberal scientific ideas in politics, religion, and social life, is far greater than men imagine. It is not surprising that, in so marked a transition period from the old to the new as that of the nineteenth century, women trained to think, and write, and speak should have discovered that they too had some share in the new-born liberties suddenly announced to the world.

That the radical political theories propagated in different countries made their legitimate impress on the minds of women of the highest culture is clearly proved by their writings and conversation. The quickening power of the Protestant Reformation roused woman as well as men to new and higher thought. The bold declarations of Luther, placing individual judgment above church authority; the faith of the Quaker, that the inner light was a better guide than arbitrary law; the religious idealism of the transcendentalists and their teachings that soul had no sex,—all such marked influences in developing self-assertion in woman. Such ideas, making all divine revelations as veritable and momentous to one soul as another, tended directly to equalize the human family, and place men and women on the same plane of moral responsibility. The revelations of science, too, analyzing and portraying the beauty and glory of this material world, crowned with new dignity man and woman, Nature's last and proudest work. Combe and Spurzheim, proving by their physiological discoveries that the feelings and sentiments of the soul mould the skull, gave new importance to woman's thought as mother of the race. Thus each new idea in religion, politics, science, and philosophy, tending to individualism rather than authority, came into the world freighted with new hope of liberty for woman.

Yours respectfully,
ELIZABETH CADY STANTON.
TENAFLY, N. J., Oct. 16, 1876.

THE AMERICAN ALLIANCE AND GOVERNOR HAYES.

As we have heretofore remarked, the main point to be considered in Governor Hayes' connection with the American Alliance is not so much the fact that the Republican candidate for the Presidency sympathizes with an organization which advocates the narrow and selfish principles of Know-Nothingism, as the disgraceful way in which he and his friends have sought to evade suspicion by quibbles, subterfuges, and downright falsehood. The glaring inconsistencies in which Hayes and his followers have been thus involved, place him in such a pitiable light that every attempt to secure public confidence in his promises must be answered with scornful laughter. To show the desperate efforts which Hayes has made to worm out of the embarrassment into which his connection with the American Alliance has brought him, it will be worth while to recapitulate the substance of all the statements in regard to it, including the attempt at contradiction on the part of the Republican candidate.

The first statement in regard to this subject appeared in the World, in which Hayes was reported to have written a letter on the 6th of July, 1876, to Lem. J. Tyler, the Secretary of the American Alliance, returning thanks for his election as a member of the Alliance, and expressing his sympathy with the purposes of that organization. Hayes thereupon had a statement published, in a letter written by his secretary, L. A. Lee, and dated at Columbus, Ohio, Sept. 14, denying that any such letter as that mentioned by the World had ever been published, or that there was a single word of truth in the story that he ever endorsed such sentiments as had been attributed to him, in writing or otherwise. This was followed on the 7th of October by the fac-simile of Lee's letter, which he had written by direction of Gov. Hayes, and in which the receipt of a copy of the resolutions of the American Alliance is acknowledged, and a promise is given of such assistance and cooperation, at the proper time, as may seem most advisable. At the same time it was explicitly asserted that on the 5th of July, in the Continental Hotel at Philadelphia, Hayes had received a deputation from the Alliance which informed him of his nomination; that another deputation visited him on the 9th of July, in Columbus, and tendered him a copy of the constitution and by-laws of the order, and of the oath of membership, and a certificate of his election to honorary membership; that he accepted the documents, and promised to give his answer of formal acceptance in writing.

By these revelations the Republicans were placed in great embarrassment. They did not seem to know, in the first moment of dismay, how to go to work to weaken the ruinous impression which was certain to result. Had the letter been a forgery and the reports about the interviews and nomination been untrue, this could have been proved by the person who was alleged as the author of the letter and by the persons named as the members of the deputations, all of whom could easily be reached. This, however, was known to be impossible, and Mr. Wickoff, the President of the Republican Central Committee of Ohio, hit upon the idea of asserting that Lee's letter had been written without Hayes' knowledge or authorization. This was the best explanation that could be devised, and Lee himself was obliged to confess a forgery, and, in a telegram sent to Chicago, acknowledged that he had written the letter in which assistance and cooperation from the Republican party were promised to the American Alliance, without consultation with Gov. Hayes and without his knowledge. It did not occur to them that this would make the denial of the genuineness of the first letter, to which Lee's signature was likewise attached, less likely to obtain credence. For if this man, in his master's name, but without his master's knowledge or assent, can accept a nomination and promise the assistance and cooperation of the Republican party, he will certainly have no scruples about questioning the genuineness of a letter, likewise, without his master's wish or knowledge, particularly when it is desirable thereby to release Hayes from a serious embarrassment.

Let it be remembered that Mr. Wickoff and Mr. Lee assert that the latter's letter, in which, by direction of Gov. Hayes, the announcement of his nomination by the American Alliance is acknowledged with thanks, and assistance and cooperation are promised, was written without the assent or knowledge of the Republican candidate. This assertion, however, is contradicted by Mr. Schurz in a speech, delivered at Akron, Ohio, last Friday evening, in which he says: "I spoke with Gov. Hayes in regard to the reports about this affair, about three weeks ago. The whole thing rests on nothing but a business answer which the Governor's secretary wrote in reply to a friendly letter. I believe I have answered similar letters in a similar way—dozens of times in the course of my life." According to this, therefore, Hayes did know that the secretary had answered the letter received from the Alliance, and if this reply was so innocent as Schurz tries to make it out, why do the President of the Republican Central Committee of Ohio and Mr. Secretary Lee find it necessary to deny Hayes' knowledge of it?

But this is not all. The Times, a few days ago, published a letter from L. S. Tyler, the Secretary of the American Alliance, in which, while admitting the genuineness of Lee's letter, that person also asserts that two years ago the American Alliance, in the same manner, offered Mr. Tilden their support as candidate for Governor. And yesterday a telegram was received from Cincinnati, declaring that this same Mr. Tyler had resigned his position as Secretary of the American Alliance, and sailed for Europe on the 25th of August, while on the 6th of October he is represented as writing to the Times as mentioned above.

But this is not all. Yesterday's Cincinnati Inquirer is reported by telegraph to have published the following letter, of which the original is said to be in the possession of that journal:—

"COLUMBUS, Ohio, June 29, 1876.
"L. S. TYLER, Secretary of the American Alliance, New York:

"Dear Sir,—I have received your favor of the 9th and 19th inst., together with the certificate of membership, constitution, etc., of the American Alliance. Permit me to express my thanks for the confidence which you place in me. In the hope that I shall prove myself worthy of it, I remain your fellow-citizen,
R. B. HAYES."

Hayes was nominated at the Cincinnati Convention on the 14th of June. In the course of that month the officers of the Alliance probably endeavored to satisfy themselves as to whether he agreed with their views, and after the affirmative answer of the 29th June he was formally endorsed by them on the 4th of July, for which he directed his secretary on the 10th of July to acknowledge the announcement of the nomination with thanks, and to inform the officers of the Alliance that at the proper time he would send them further advice, which would enable them to get the requisite aid and support in their work.

The endeavors of Hayes and his friends to release him from the fatal predicament into which he has fallen are but a tissue of subterfuges, falsehoods, and inconsistencies, which place the Republican candidate for the Presidency in the light of a cowardly demagogue. Had Hayes openly acknowledged that he had accepted the nomination and even the honorary membership of the American Alliance without being explicitly informed as to the principles of the order, or that he did not consider himself bound thereby, should he be elected, to countenance its extreme demands, this might have hurt him with the adopted citizens of the country, but the public confidence in his trustworthiness in general would not have been shaken. But since he has not the courage to admit a fact which cannot be denied, and with equivocal and contemptible evasions seeks to avoid the responsibility for his acts, he creates well-founded doubts as to how much faith may be placed upon his assurances in relation to other questions of importance that come up for discussion in the Presidential campaign. Compassion for Mr. Schurz and a number of other gentlemen who base their preferences in the campaign upon the private promises made to them by Hayes, should at least have made that gentleman careful to avoid assuming a position in which the assertion that they have made their choice in reliance upon his private promises must appear absolutely ridiculous.—New York Staats Zeitung.

A LITTLE FIVE-YEAR-OLD BOY heard the Bible story of Samson a few Sunday evenings ago for the first time. He was much impressed with the efficiency of the weapon which Samson used in one of his hand-to-hand conflicts with the Philistines. A day or two after, his mother, just before getting into a carriage, was attempting to break a piece of candy which she had promised to divide between the little lad and his brother. The candy was tough and resisted her efforts. In this emergency the smaller boy looked up at the coachman, and said: "Say, James, you haven't got the jawbone of an ass about you, have you?"

MATTHEW ARNOLD says the definition of God, containing nothing that cannot be verified, is: "The Eternal, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness."

CASH RECEIPTS.

FOR THE WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 28.

M. R. Warren, $3.20; W. J. Worden, $3; F. H. Isham, $3.50; J. P. Atwater, $3.20; N. H. Webster, $4.40; P. K. Wright, $6.40; J. L. Stoddard, $1; J. L. Hammett, $1.75; D. A. Cline, $3.20; Alex. Foster, $3.20; David Feimley, 25 cents; Ella Dozier, $1.75; Miss Hastings, $3.20; A. H. Newton, $3.25; W. H. Fitch, $3.20; R. G. Merriam, $3.25; M. Romahn, $3.20; E. S. Wicklin, 10 cents; L. Campbell, $5.45; H. W. Moore, $3.20; J. H. Hill, $3.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

The Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 2, 1876.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 25 Monroe Street: J. T. FAWCETT, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE of Houston, Texas, has published its Constitution and By-Laws in a neat little tract of fifteen pages, for a copy of which the Secretary will please accept our thanks.

MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD (wife of Mr. B. F. Underwood, the able, respected, and well-known lecturer) has just published a book, entitled Heroines of Free Thought, which will be read with intense interest by all who would learn something of woman's greatest achievements in character and intellect. It is a most charmingly written book, full of sympathy for the subjects of these brief and necessarily imperfect biographies, and marked by the same mental courage, delicacy of feeling, and dignity of moral tone, which have always greatly impressed us in reading Mrs. Underwood's articles in the Investigator and THE INDEX. We hope it will attain a large circulation, and refer to our last page for further information respecting it.

A FEW subscribers to THE INDEX have discontinued the paper on account of dissatisfaction with some of the political opinions which have been expressed in it. It is necessary to state plainly, it seems, that we are no more called upon than are these dissatisfied subscribers to "rebut" the opinions of our contributors. Why do they not imitate the far manlier course of those other subscribers who, when dissatisfied, do the "rebutting" themselves in these very columns? We respect the latter as truly liberal, for they have learned to be earnest on behalf of their own opinions and at the same time to respect the equal earnestness of others on behalf of other opinions. It is fairly mortifying to find any INDEX subscriber so bigoted and intolerant as not to endure the public expression of views he dislikes; THE INDEX has been published these nearly seven years in vain for him. Let it be distinctly understood that it is no part of our duty to "rebut" anybody's honest thought, and that we are ready to see THE INDEX die sooner than assume any tone of moral superiority when nothing but differences of thought are expressed. Our contributors are not our pupils, to be disciplined, punished, or rewarded; they are men and women with minds of their own, responsible to their own consciences and not to ours. Whatever their errors on religion, morals, or politics, the readers of THE INDEX are just as much under obligation as we are to correct them. Not a number of this paper is issued in which there is not something from which we dissent; and we comment on such things only when we find it convenient to do so. If the American public are still too narrow-minded to sustain a journal of freethought on the plan of THE INDEX, they may let it die when they please; we shall not change this plan in the slightest to save it from death. But we consider no man a liberal who cannot read an article which expresses views different from his own without straightway "rebutting" the editor for not "rebutting" somebody else by stopping his paper. If there is no other journal in America free enough to give equal rights to all honest writers, there shall at least be one while THE INDEX lives.

DEATH OF RALPH H. RANNEY.

Just as we go to press, the sad necessity is laid upon us of announcing the sudden death of RALPH H. RANNEY, Director and Treasurer of the Index Association, and Secretary of the National Liberal League. We can give no particulars now, but make this brief announcement with poignant grief and a consciousness of absolutely irreparable loss. A gentler, truer, braver, purer, or better man was never lost to the cause of liberalism, or to the friends who now follow him to the grave with tears.

"THEISM."

It is not possible, in a mere editorial article, to do justice to the elaborate and ingenious essay of Mr. Lum in our present issue. The theme he discusses involves the whole of philosophy, in the widest acceptance of that term; and the effect of continued study is only to beget a consciousness of the vastness, complexity, and difficulty of the questions which must be answered before a final scientific solution of the problem can be attained. To say that Mr. Lum has not answered all these questions, or that the reasoning he employs still leaves the subject open to further inquiry, is not at all to impugn the ability of his treatment of it; the fact seems to be that human knowledge is far too limited as yet to permit a final disposition of it, and that the world must wait a while longer before the ultimate bearings of the evolution philosophy on the question of theism can be definitely determined.

A few passing criticisms, however, may be properly offered. When Mr. Lum asserts, for instance, that "natural selection, or the survival of the fittest, has effectually displaced the theory of design in modern thought," it is opportune to cite the following language of Professor Huxley in the Academy for October, 1869: "It is necessary to remark that there is a wider teleology which is not touched by the doctrine of evolution, but is actually based upon the fundamental proposition of evolution. . . . The teleological and the mechanical views of Nature are not necessarily mutually exclusive; on the contrary, the more purely a mechanist the speculator is, the more firmly does he assume a primordial molecular arrangement of which all the phenomena of the universe are the consequences; and the more completely thereby is he at the mercy of the teleologist, who can always defy him to disprove that this primordial molecular arrangement was not intended to evolve the phenomena of the universe." This very remarkable passage from the writings of perhaps the ablest defender of the evolution theory—remarkable for its sturdy honesty as well as for the vast concession it makes—has received altogether too little attention in discussions on this theme. It is a distinct recognition of the truth that "natural selection, or the survival of the fittest, has" not "effectually displaced the theory of design in modern thought."

Again, Mr. Lum says: "Evolution is solely the result of mechanical causes." That is to say, Mr. Lum espouses at the outset the solely mechanical theory of evolution, and thereby begs the question! If he is correct, all the rest of his essay is surplusage. The whole issue between the mechanist and the dynamist schools of the evolution philosophy (and the existence of these two schools is one of the most important though least recognized facts of the case) is whether "evolution is solely the result of mechanical causes," or whether a universal dynamical cause is necessarily implied by each and every one of them. Mr. Lum himself unconsciously takes for granted this universal dynamical cause, when he proceeds to add forthwith: "The only operating agent in Nature recognized by the evolution philosophy is molecular energy." What is this "energy"? "Energy" is not a mechanical, but a strictly dynamical, conception; it is equivalent to "power" or "force" in action. All that the strict mechanist could have said would be: "The only ultimate fact in Nature recognized by the evolution philosophy is molecular motion." Mr. Lum has unwittingly but fatally betrayed his original thesis, by this admission of "molecular energy" as an "operating agent in Nature." Such admissions are continually made by those who defend the mechanist view, not intentionally, but (as we believe) because it is absolutely impossible to empty the mind of all dynamical conceptions, which constantly reappear in most unexpected forms to defeat the narrow mechanist interpretation of the universe. From this fatal necessity, it seems, Mr. Lum himself cannot escape.

The real issue between the theistic and the nontheistic forms of the evolution philosophy is this: Shall the total process of evolution, from the first to the last, be viewed as a mere succession of molecular motions unconnected by any dynamical nexus and undirected to any predetermined end? Or shall it be viewed as a succession of molecular motions which, taken together, constitute the seriated manifestations of a universal dynamical cause, and had for a predetermined end the transformation of undifferentiated nebula into the existing differentiated universe? Put in a more popular form, the question may be stated thus: Has the existing universe been evolved with or without an omnipresent purpose and power? Each alternative assumes the entire fact of evolution, just as modern science presents it; the issue is as to the interpretation of this fact. The scientific theist finds the evolutionary process, as a whole, analogous in some very important respects to what he knows in himself as the operation of intelligence, and therefore, without a tincture of dogmatism, believes in God. The mechanist recognizes no such analogy, and therefore does not believe in God. The issue is one to be met in a spirit of the purest love of truth for its own sake, without the slightest assumption of superiority on either side; and it is an issue which can only be decided by the progress of science itself. Something, however, is gained by a clear statement of the question; and we hope that our attempt to state it afresh will set it in a clearer light.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA NEGRO.

The department of "Current Events" again furnishes me with a text for this week's paper. Political discussions like these may not be exactly in order in THE INDEX. And for this reason I made my criticisms on "R. C.'s" comments upon the political situation in South Carolina as brief as possible. But since he returned to the subject last week in a lengthy rejoinder to my criticisms—modifying, indeed, the sweeping character of some of his previous statements, but defending them in substance and preserving the same tone of contempt towards the negro,—a little more space may justifiably be used on the other side.

In the first place let me say, what I should have no need to say to any one familiar with my sentiments, that I am no denier nor defender of the misgovernment that has prevailed in many parts of the South since the war. The history of the South Carolina Legislature, and the evidences of corruption and public plunder in the State, are as familiar to me as they can be to "R. C." Perhaps I might even add some to his list of dark facts. But the conclusions I draw from the facts are very different from his. He has evidently followed Mr. Pike's book, to which he refers, too closely, especially in its spirit towards the negroes: a book that contains no little substance of truth, but written with so much prejudice as to be an unsafe authority. Yet even admitting all of Mr. Pike's charges against the Legislature and government of the State, I should still maintain that it does not follow that the South Carolina negro has shown himself "utterly incapable of self-government," nor that "the white man alone can rule the State" properly.

Such an incident as the disgraceful betting-scene between Moses and Whipper in which, it is alleged, the Legislature voted to pay the bet, does not prove much one way or the other. Moses is a white man, and no "carpet-bagger" either. He is a scion of an old Southern family. And he is a specimen of a good many white men that would be likely to come into power with Wade Hampton's party.

It would be said, of course, that a white Legislature would not have been led so easily, or at least so openly, into paying the bet. And this brings us to the real question at issue,—which is that of the wisdom and success of negro suffrage. I take it that "R. C." does not believe in "negro suffrage"; that at least he thinks it has proved a failure in the South. What else can he mean by the assertion that "the Southern negro has shown himself utterly incapable of self-government"? By the native Southerner such a saying would also be interpreted to mean that the negro is by nature incapacitated to take any part in republican government, and can never be governed except by the superior white race. Were it not that "R. C." quotes with approval a sentence from my previous article, I should be inclined to think, from his prevailing tone towards the negro, that this latter interpretation were the true one.

The wisdom of the decision to give the ballot to the colored man is a point that need not detain us. The act was a national necessity. But to see a political necessity and to yield to it in time, is wisdom in statesmanship. When the old white voters in South Carolina attempted to reconstruct their government after the war, they were detected in the act of framing a "Black Code," which would have practically nullified emancipation and have reduced the colored people to serfdom. Then United States army officers, who were in the State, among them a distinguished general who had always affiliated with the Democratic party, urged upon Congress the absolute necessity of giving suffrage to the negro as the only means of insuring his freedom,—unless the Federal government were to continue military rule with a large army. Hence the suffrage amendment.

Now as to the success of the measure. That to put the ballot into the hands of the negroes, hardly emerged from the condition of slaves, and burdened with all the ignorance and degradation which bondage had entailed upon them, was to subject the principle of universal suffrage and republican institutions in general to a terrific strain, no thoughtful person will deny. And if the experiment was likely to prove a failure anywhere, it would be most likely to do so in South Carolina, where the negroes had a large majority of the population, and the native whites were least disposed to accept the situation, and the chances were greater for demagogues and adventurers of both colors to ply their calling. But the experiment even there has not been a failure. That gross evils of incompetency and fraud have attended it, is not to be denied. But in spite of all the evils and all the disadvantages, the experiment as a whole, when we consider the obstacles that were to be overcome, is a most encouraging proof of the strength of republican institutions, and of the capacity of the negro for the duties of citizenship. In support of this statement I referred in my previous article to the fact of the gradual improvement of the Legislatures in intelligence and morality. "R. C." tries to break the force of this fact by quoting from Mr. Pike a description of the ill appearance and evil acts of the Legislature in 1873, and thence arguing that the progress must have been geologically slow if so recent a Legislature was so bad as this description makes it, and the last Legislature was bad enough to elect Moses and Whipper as judges. Well, great social movements are slow, but nevertheless they may be sure and successful. But the progress in this case has not been very slow. Mr. Pike describes the Legislature in 1873 as a scene of disorder, folly, and crime. I was myself a frequent visitor in the Legislature that was in session in the winter and spring of 1876, and I can honestly testify that it was usually a well-conducted body; and that I never found it in more confusion or doing more foolish things than I have often witnessed in the House of Representatives at Washington. This is not to name a very lofty standard, it is true, but it is enough for my argument. I was a constant reader of the newspapers, and I do not recall any specific charges brought against this last Legislature for corrupt or fraudulent legislation. There were general charges, such as one may sometimes see in partisan newspapers concerning Northern Legislatures, but no accusations that seemed to have any other weight than as party epithets. It was the general impression of people with whom I conversed that the body was quite free from corrupt influences; and the improvement in the character of the Legislative assemblies and of the government in general was a frequent subject of remark by friend and foe. True, this Legislature elected Moses and Whipper, and it had other shortcomings. But it ferreted out some rascalities, and helped Gov. Chamberlain somewhat to reduce taxation and in other reformatory plans.

Further,—negro suffrage, or negro government, if that phrase be preferred, is shown to be no failure in the State by the fact that many of the bad men who were at first elevated to power have been detected and cast off, not a few of them through the regular processes of law having been sent to the penitentiary. Almost every jury that it summoned in the State has, I suppose, a majority of colored members. Yet there is no difficulty in convicting colored criminals, as the prisons themselves show, a large majority of their inmates being colored; a fact which, if, on one side, it tells against the morals of the negro, testifies, on the other, to his impartial respect for law, and his capacity for self-government.

Still further,—since the era of reconstruction the regular forms of government have been preserved in the State uninterrupted, and notwithstanding the early Ku-Klux outrages and the periods of excited political campaigns, the general condition of things has been orderly. The industries of the State have continued, and some new ones have been developed.

The railroads and other means of communication have been kept in operation. Schools have increased. Churches and charitable institutions have been sustained. Improvements have been introduced in prison discipline. The capital has been rebuilt. These, certainly, are not features that attend civil anarchy. They may not all depend on the State government, but we should hardly expect to find them all in connection with a government that is a total failure. Indeed, on the occasion of two visits of considerable length to the State in the last four years, when I have remembered what a complete social and political revolution the State suddenly witnessed, the slaves becoming at one step the political masters, the wonder with me has been, not that things are so bad, but that they are not worse.

Yet I am not blind to existent or prospective evils, and have no lack of appreciation of the distresses that have come upon so large a portion of the old citizens. Some of these distresses are the direct result, doubtless, of recent corrupt legislation and fraudulent office-holders. But not all. Loss of property was largely the result of their own suicidal act of rebellion. Increased taxation has, to some extent, been general throughout the country, as has also financial and business depression. But whatever the special cause of their distresses, they are all, in a sense, their atoning retribution for the war and its criminal cause.

And I am convinced that no permanent remedy for the troubles of the State, and no solution of its difficult political problem, is to come through now putting into power the extreme political faction that began the war and fought for its criminal cause. A remedy might have come (and there was some prospect of it last spring) through the union of the reform element of the Republican party and the more liberal and progressive portion of the Democratic party in support of Gov. Chamberlain. But this hope was frustrated, because in the Democratic councils the Bourbon wing of the party prevailed. This faction may have able and intelligent men, but it is utterly impossible for them to conceive that the negro can have the same right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness that the white man has, and therefore they are not the men that South Carolina now needs at the head of its government. They may promise to hold sacred all the negroes' rights for the sake of attaining power; but negroes' rights are not the same thing to them as white men's rights. The Confederate Gen. Butler, who figured so conspicuously in the Hamburg massacre, is one of the prominent leaders of this faction. In the State Democratic Convention last May, I heard him give solemn assurance to the two or three colored delegates present, that, if the Democratic party came into power, it would protect the negroes in all their new rights. But what he considers as their "rights" is illustrated by his own proposition for the settlement of the Hamburg riot,—which was that the assailed negroes, a legally authorized militia company, should give up their arms to the illegal white mob that was threatening to shoot them! I have no rose-colored view of the negro as a legislator, but I am unable to see how his condition is to be improved if such men are chosen to make and execute the laws for him. Nor have I yet discovered "the indisputable facts of the last ten years" which should have so "rectified former philanthropic desires" towards the negro, that humane feeling for him will now first and chiefly express itself by calling him a "liar and a thief," a "professional legislative robber," "rascal," and "scalawag," and then handing him over as an incorrigible barbarian to the keeping of his old master.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY R. C.

Certain peculiarities of the politics of New York City may, before the end of the week, exercise an unlooked-for influence upon the prospects of the presidential candidates. It is a well-known fact that some of the Tammany Democrats do not entertain very friendly feelings towards Mr. Tilden, and would much prefer a retention of their present hold upon the government of the city to his success in either the State or the nation. Mr. Smith Ely—a very excellent man, by the way—has been nominated by them for Mayor of the city; and, as we write, it is reported that the Republicans also may nominate Ely, thereby ensuring his election, and the defeat of the Morrissey and anti-Tammany Democrats. In return for this help from the Republicans, the Tammany men are to vote for Hayes and Wheeler. Bargains of this kind are always liable to sudden failure, but the prospects of the success of this one are sufficient to cause considerable uneasiness among Democrats and corresponding elation among New York Republicans. If it should be carried out, Tilden would undoubtedly be defeated.

Mr. Tilden's letter to Mr. Hewitt, published last week, should set at rest the fears of those who have believed that in case of Democratic success we should be saddled with Southern claims or any portion of the rebel debt. Mr. Tilden declares that, if elected, "the provisions of the fourteenth amendment will be maintained, executed, and enforced"; that "no rebel debt will be assumed or paid; no claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave will be allowed; no claim for any loss or damage incurred by disloyal persons... will be recognized or paid"; that "the cotton-tax will not be refunded"; that he will "veto every bill providing for the assumption or payment of any such debts, losses, damages, claims, or for the refunding of any such tax"; and that the claims even of loyal persons should in all cases "be scrutinized with jealous care," as they "have become stale, and are often tainted with fraud."

A recent invention may yet bring about a very decided alteration in our present system of telegraphing. It is an arrangement by which sounds—including words—are transmitted in place of the present symbols. We have not space to give a description of the apparatus, but those who have seen the little toy known as "the lovers' telegraph" may gain some conception of the invention without description. The invention has been in use for some little time, over a wire two miles in length, between Boston and Cambridge, and distinct conversations are carried on at that distance. The possibility of the application of the invention to longer distances is to be tested this week, we believe, between Boston and New York. "Telegraph" may yet be replaced by "telephone."

We desire to call the attention of friends of the higher education to the Harvard College examinations for women. These have now taken place for three successive years at Cambridge, but during the present year it is proposed to establish three places of examination,—Cambridge, Boston, and New York. Two examinations are required before the bestowal of the highest college diploma. Applicants for the first examination must not be less than seventeen years of age, and will be examined in English, French, physiology, geology, elementary botany or elementary physics, arithmetic, algebra (through quadratic equations), plane geometry, history, and German or Latin or Greek. Candidates for the advanced examination must not be less than eighteen years of age, and will be examined in languages, natural sciences, mathematics, history, and philosophy. We do not understand that these studies are to be taken as a whole. The examinations will be held the first and second weeks in June, but the entries must be made by the first of April. Fee for the first examination, $15; for the second, $10. In England, analogous examinations by Cambridge University are now held at fifty-six centres, and were attended last year by one thousand five hundred and fifty-two young women. The University of Oxford examined five hundred and eighty-three.

The British Arctic expedition has returned, having added somewhat to our geographical knowledge, but failing to reach the North Pole. The discoveries of the expedition seem to prove that the open Polar Sea is somewhat mythical, and that the sea, if it exists, is probably never navigable, because of enormous accumulations of ice. The existence of President Land is also, we believe, denied. The sufferings of some of the sledge parties were extremely severe, and it is doubtful, on the whole, if any recent Arctic expeditions have added sufficiently to our geographical or scientific knowledge to compensate for their expense, and for the suffering and loss of life they inevitably entail.

That people may be converted from one religion to another by force is a fact which history conclusively proves; but that conversion should be brought about not only without consent but also without the knowledge of those converted would, a priori, be pronounced impossible. Yet this has been done in the case of the Kurghiz, of Turkestan, according to the account of Mr. Eugene Schuyler. When they were conquered by the Russians, the latter supposed them to be Mohammedans, and, in order to make them favorable to Russian rule, proceeded to build mosques and to support Mohammedan priests for their benefit. The Kurghiz accepted both mosque and priest without question, and, literally, without their own knowledge, were thus converted from Shamanism to Mohammedans. The mistake of Russia was all the more absurd inasmuch as she is a great enemy to Mohammedanism and a staunch upholder of Christianity, and the Kurghiz might just as easily have been converted to Christianity as to Mohammedanism. A similar mistake was made in the case of the Buriats who, in analogous manner, were converted from Shamanism to Buddhism.

Some time ago the Nation published an article upon "The Taxation of Church Property," which it favored because, among other reasons, most Protestant churches to-day are in reality only Sunday clubs, being attended by their members because of the social pleasures, and social and business advantages to be thus gained. We had hardly supposed that the validity of this argument would be admitted by church dignitaries, and are glad, therefore, to come upon an unexpected admission of the premises, at least, if not of the conclusion. In a recent sermon delivered at the dedication of a "free chapel" in New York, Bishop Potter, of the Episcopal Church, spoke against our present pew-system as responsible, to a certain extent, for keeping the poor from our churches. Pews, he declared, have often a positive money-value because of their power to confer a certain amount of social distinction upon their occupants. The bearing of this fact upon the question of the taxation of church property is obvious, and we should like to commend it to the candid consideration of the President of Harvard College.

An interesting article upon "The Liturgy of the Jews," written by a Jew, is copied from an English magazine by Little's Living Age. The writer asserts, and fully supports his assertion by illustrative extracts, that the liturgy employed by the Jews of England in their regular Sunday services, contains, amid many beauties, a great deal of absurd and puerile matter, especially in its prayers. These prayers are required to be read every Sunday, and we need not wonder, therefore, at his statement that the rabbis or ministers who are conscious of their absurdity gabble through some portions of them and manage to skip the rest. Reform, which has been attempted, is prevented by the conservatism of a prominent Jewish ecclesiastic, Dr. Adler, and the obstinacy of the leading and wealthiest members of the congregations, although nine-tenths of the rabbis would welcome a change. His criticisms apply only to the liturgy of the German and Polish Jews, that of the Spanish Jews being free from most of these absurdities, and that of the Reformed Jews not containing them at all. He asserts that very many Jews are giving up the faith of their fathers; but adds, significantly, "They may cease to be Jews, indeed, but they do not, for all that, become Christians."

We desire to inform these among our readers who indulge in prayer according to rule, that two weeks of steady prayer have been resolved upon by the proper authorities of the two bodies which are supposed to know most about the matter referred to by the irreverent Tyndall when he desired to know the proper allowance to be made in his experiments, for the dynamic influence of a prayer. The Executive Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association has appointed November 12th to 18th inclusive as a period of prayer. We commend this appointment especially to all politicians. The results of the election will be certainly known by the 12th of November, and one-half the politicians of the country will know that the other half need to be prayed for. The Evangelical Alliance has appointed January 7th to 14th as a week of prayer. Programmes, to insure harmony of appeal, are already issued, and we trust that one may be sent to the unbelieving Tyndall, and that his experimental apparatus may be put in perfect order. Otherwise we may have him by-and-by declaring that January 15th exhibited no effect of the tremendous dynamic influence brought to a focus by the Alliance on the day before.

ENGLISH SKETCHES.

BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT.

LONDON, Oct. 14, 1876.

I do not know whether you, in America, have ever heard of our Dialectical Society in London. It has been in existence now for many years, and has numbered many great names among its members. As vice-presidents we have had Professor Huxley, Dr. Chapman, G. H. Lewes, Viscount Amberley, M. D. Conway, and other well-known folk, and the weekly gathering attracts men and women well known in the literary world. Some little time ago an article appeared in the Christian World dealing with the proceedings of the society. The writer appears to have visited the society for the first time, and to be somewhat puzzled at the phenomenon before him, of staid, earnest, middle-class folk discussing the very unorthodox subject of marriage and divorce. Our visitor says:—

"Proceeding on the indubitable fact that all philosophers of all creeds have agreed that truth is of all things the most to be desired, and that it is best elicited by the conflict of opposing opinions, several gentlemen of various tastes—literary, and scientific, and philosophic—resolved to found a society for the purpose of the interchange of opinion on all subjects of interest. 'Ah!' you say, 'a debating society.' Oh, no, nothing of the kind. In a debating society, as an ordinary rule, only surface questions are discussed. The Dialecticians have a higher aim. Accordingly, they have formed a philosophical association, where sectarianism of every kind is rigidly excluded; where all distinctions founded on social condition, occupation, and the like, are disregarded; where the only qualifications for membership are an unstained character—whatever that may mean,—and a genuine desire for the promotion of the objects of the society. Another fundamental rule of the society is the most absolute freedom of debate. No subject whatever is excluded on any ground save that of triviality. 'Let us emulate,' say they, 'the example of the great Athenian philosopher of antiquity, the aim of whose existence was the demonstration of reasoned truth, and the exposure of the errors and fallacies of his age; who, absolutely regardless of all consequences, passed his life in the bold enunciation of the truth, and voluntarily and cheerfully forfeited it in its defence; whose virtue, courage, and wisdom have earned for him the veneration of posterity.'"

The peculiarity of the Dialectical Society is that every speaker may be questioned. A paper is read by the opener of the debate, and the reading lasts some twenty minutes or half an hour; when he concludes, any member may get up and ask questions, to which he must reply; then the discussion is open, each speaker being limited to ten minutes; as each sits down, he or she may be questioned. If an empty, wordy speech is made, a few pointed questions make it collapse with a suddenness amusing to all except the unlucky speaker. Errors in logic, in imagery, in illustration, are thus remorselessly exposed, and no better training for debate can be imagined. At the close of two hours the debate is either adjourned, or else the opener has the right of twenty minutes to reply. No subject is tabooed among us, and perhaps the chief value of the society consists in the fact that every subject may be freely and openly discussed, personally and conscientiously of expression alone meeting with rebuke. The views of the majority are of the most liberal kind, as is natural when the friction they are exposed to is considered.

Some months ago I opened a debate there on the marriage question. Although I dealt with it from the John Stuart Mill point, regarding it as a contract which should be dissolved if it became a source of misery to the contracting parties, and contended that divorce should carry with it full liberty of remarriage, yet only one speaker took a view thoroughly opposed to that which I propounded. It so chanced that a similar subject was on the tapis when the reporter of the Christian World found himself transported into a world by no means Christian. He writes: "To me the novelty of the meeting consisted in the fact that here, in a superior and comfortably-fitted-up hall, by the very middle class who are supposed to be the very incarnation of respectability and the dogged opponents of un-English ideas, a style of talk was indulged in which I should not have been surprised at at the Hall of Science, but of which I fear the clergy of all denominations, who go on in their daily task of chopping up old straw, have not the remotest idea. With scarcely one exception, every speaker, male or female, denounced our English law of matrimony, and pleaded for what seemed very much like unlimited divorce,—such divorce as exists, for instance, in the State of Indiana, which, according to the statements of Mr. Conway, who had recently visited the land, blossomed and rejoiced with all the moral virtues, and was as near being an earthly Paradise as was possible to man."

The feeling among thinking people in England is growing very strong against our present marriage laws. While they by no means desire that marriage should be destroyed, or that unions unrecognized by the State should take its place, they do desire that some way should be found out of the misery which results from the binding together of unsuitable human beings with a band that cannot be broken except through infidelity. Our English law is peculiarly unjust, and tends directly to promote immorality. It sanctions the fatal partial divorce, divorce "from bed and board," while refusing to the parties so divorced liberty of remarriage, and thus it throws on society young men and women, without home ties, who are practically widows and widowers, but who may be prosecuted for bigamy if they marry. If there were a devil, and he invented a scheme for promoting immorality, he could devise none more ingenious than this. Men and women will love when thrown together, without any pre-existing tie; and to refuse them the liberty to do so openly and frankly is to put a premium on immorality. The English law is also extremely partial as between men and women. It very properly allows the husband to gain a divorce against his wife if his wife be unfaithful to him; but it does not give to the wife the right of divorcing an unfaithful husband, unless to the adultery be added either desertion or cruelty. A man may be as immoral as he chooses, provided that he supports his wife and does not ill-use her; and if she leaves him he may compel her to return and live with him. All she can gain by going into court against an immoral husband is the partial divorce alluded to above, which forbids her to remarry during her unfaithful husband's lifetime. Most thoughtful people now agree with Mr. Volkman, the reader of the paper at the Dialectical on the occasion reported in the Christian World:—

"(1) That while divorce has become a recognized part of our legal system, yet the present law of divorce does not in any sufficient or decent manner provide the community with the means of annulling unsuitable marriages, but really operates in restraint of legitimate redress; (2) That for the well-being of society the present anomalous divorce system should be abolished in favor of legislation providing timely, suitable, and amicable means of marriage annulment in cases of infelicitous unions."

Our present system is a compromise between the Christian and the utilitarian notions of marriage: the Christian regards it as a sacrament, and, therefore, considers the marriage bond indissoluble; the utilitarian regards it as a contract, and, therefore, considers that it should be dissoluble when it becomes injurious to the contracting parties. The divorce law of the French Legislative Assembly of 1792 is, perhaps, as good and just a law as could be framed. The discussion of the subject in Dialectical fashion seems to have disturbed the serenity of the reporter of the Christian World, who apparently regards such discussion as a portentous sign:—

"The Dialecticians in their search after truth perhaps ran, it may be, to the other extreme. At any rate their success in the heart of London is an interesting fact. It is said one-half the world does not know how the other half lives. That may be true, but that it is true as regards intellectual and moral life I have not the remotest doubt. Any Sunday you may see such people as the Dialecticians walking demurely to church, prayer-book in hand. Oh, that the parson would think of that when he is proclaiming the drying up of the Euphrates, or waxing eloquent on the little horn of Ezekiel!"

Truly, if the parsons knew what many of the quiet-looking members of their congregations say and do during the week, the smooth commonplaceness of the Sunday sermon would be much ruffled. What a crash that will be, which is surely coming, when the fabric of national religion, honey-combed through and through with infidelity, will fall as by an earthquake shock, and the stunned believers in worn-out superstitions shall rouse themselves to see that Christianity is numbered among the religions of the past, the worn-out and cast-off creed-clothes of a larger grown humanity!

A VOICE FROM THE SOUTH.

ATLANTA, Ga., Oct. 24, 1876.

EDITOR INDEX:

Sir,—Your issue of Oct. 19 contains an editorial on "The Situation," in which you deplore the existence of a "white man's party" at the South, while I regard it as an absolute necessity, a matter indeed of self-preservation. And why? Because as a class the whites are the tax-payers, and the negroes as a class pay little or no taxes. It is a fact needing very little demonstration to prove that a lot of non-tax-payers (and withal exceedingly ignorant) are a very unsafe body to be clothed with the power of levying the taxes. And mark you; ninety-nine per cent. of the money thus assessed necessarily comes out of the pockets of the "white man's party," whose organization in this section you look upon with so much distrust. Had it not been for this same movement, so much deprecated by you, this State (Georgia) would now have been in the deplorable condition of South Carolina and Louisiana, whose sufferings have become historic. It would be a waste of time to enlarge on facts so well known. Suffice it is to say that the citizens of these States in many instances have been absolutely beggared by the taxes (almost amounting to confiscation) imposed by insouciant negro legislatures, the taxes often being more than the income derived from the property. Escape from such a state of things seemed desirable to the "Southern white savages," and hence the necessity, as a choice of evils, of a "white man's party." I say a choice of evils, because I am free to confess that it is an evil for any set of men to obtain the exclusive control of any government (be it State or National) for an indefinite period.

In this case, however, I honestly believe it to be the lesser of two evils. As an evidence of this, I will call your attention to the fact that Georgia bonds are now quoted at par and above, while the States which suffer under the rule of a negro majority are of little or no value. I believe it is admitted by most fair-minded men that the negroes are better off in Georgia than in any other Southern State.

Mr. Herbert Spencer (vide Sociology) seems to lean to the opinion that the Established Church of England was beneficial "during a certain phase of progress, being at the time the best thing practicable, and really did good work for mankind in general." Can it not possibly be true that this "white man's party" in like manner may now be the best thing practicable in Southern politics until the colored "man and brother" is better fitted by education to wear gracefully these "honors thrust upon him"? I believe a candid comparison of the condition of these Southern States where the whites are in the majority, with those in which the negroes are in the ascendancy, will compel a belief that it is better for both races for the whites to control the government for the present at least.

In conclusion, allow me to notice a remark in an article by "W. J. P." ("Justice, not Partisanship"). He says, speaking of the Southern people: "There is a large section of the white race more ignorant and degraded than the negro." This is a statement in my judgment impossible to verify. While I admit that very intelligent negroes, and especially mulattoes, are to be found in most of the Southern cities, and in many instances they are really the superiors of some white men living in the backwoods, I assert, without the fear of successful contradiction, that "W. J. P." is incorrect, when he says that there is a large section of the white race more ignorant and degraded than the negro (as a race).

Respectfully, O. H. GREEN.

AN INDIGNANT PROTEST.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

How much easier it is to see the mote in other people's eyes than to pick the beams out of our own! In your last issue (Oct. 19) I read with indignation the concluding paragraph of the "Glimpse"—which I presume I am right in crediting to your editorial pen,—apropos to the present anarchical condition of affairs in South Carolina: "Such a state of things justifies the employment of the whole military power of the nation to protect the freedom of the ballot-box and the rights of the manacled negroes. This is the paramount issue in South Carolina, and we hope to hear yet that Wade Hampton and his horde of murderers are beaten off the field." Now if you had ever met this man Wade Hampton, you could not have made such a palpable misrepresentation of his character as to associate his candidacy with the idea of an individual who would accept, under any circumstances, the support of a "horde of murderers." My dear sir, if you were to charge Charles Francis Adams and Frank Bird with having deliberately plotted to assassinate Governor Rice, you would not more gravely have falsified the actual facts of the situation. But I was not a little mollified—not to say amused,—on turning over the pages of my INDEX, to come upon the following statement (in the identical No. 356 containing the quotation already given) in the admirable and fairly impartial record of "Current Events":—

"The South Carolina Democrats are determined to elect Wade Hampton at all hazards, and they have our best wishes for their success, although some of their methods of gaining votes are unquestionably dishonorable, and are paralleled only by the actions of the national administration toward its employees. They are giving the negro to understand that future employment and consequent bread and butter will depend upon the transfer of the negro's allegiance to the Democratic party. Democratic butchers, and bakers, and candlestick-makers are advertising their wares in the South Carolina newspapers, and it is evident that all white Republicans are to be put, if they are not already, under a social ban. We have no desire to attempt to justify these proceedings, but pious Republicans who are grieved at their appearance must have forgotten that human nature is not angelic nature, and that ten years of subjection to ignorant negroes would not be likely to develop the purest methods of political action."

Now we are upon the eve of an exciting election, which will result, I have no doubt, in relegating the Southern States to the care of their natural guardians, and thus do away forever with the sickening display of presumptuous arrogance and inexcusable ignorance which has mainly characterized the cold-blooded assumptions of Northern editors in reference to the characters, motives, and intentions of Southern whites. I can understand the despairing wails of Federal officials, who foresee hard work in the future, in the place of well-paid sinecures; but I confess my inability to explain the necessity for our "liberal" INDEX displaying the tattered remnant of the ensanguined undergarment. I know—because I have seen with my own eyes,—that, so far as "Southern outrages" are concerned, as between the blacks and whites, "it is six of one and half a dozen of the other." However, I long since learned that it is more difficult for the average Republican to forgive the defeated Southerners, who have suffered so much through the effects of their secession folly, than for those same Southerners to forget the pharisaical criticisms of their Northern antagonists, upon a subject the latter have blundered about as much as the present English Ministry have in making the mistake of supporting Turkey against the outraged Servians. In both cases the cause and effect have been identical. A selfish interest has sufficed to close the eyes of either to the real facts, and, in order to retain a predominance in political power which did not normally attach to them, English and Americans committed themselves to the support of a pernicious policy, and Servians and Southerners have suffered until forbearance has ceased to be a virtue.

But, not to weary your patience, permit me to call your careful attention, in conclusion, to the following extract from Redpath's letter, summing up the Southern situation, as published recently in the Independent:

"I never experienced so keen a sorrow, connected with public affairs, as during my visit to Mississippi. I never had so profound a contempt for what is called the conservative Republican policy. We ought never to have given the negro a vote, or we ought to have forced him to learn to read, and built a school for him in every township. He has shown that he is not fit to rule in Mississippi. He is the dupe in peace of black and white demagogues; and, alas, in war—for the last campaign was a military revolution—he is the only victim who suffers from our sins of omission. The negro county governments in Mississippi bore the same relation to orderly Republican administrations that negro minstrelsy burlesques bear to the divine symphonies of Beethoven. What right had we to expect a better result? Fellow-Republicans, it is idle to denounce the South. We are to blame. We knew the negro to be timid, unarmed, illiterate; and yet we left him in the midst of the fiercest fighters on this planet, and expected him to rule them."

"In Mississippi, his power went down in violence and blood. So it will disappear, unless we act promptly, in South Carolina and Louisiana. It is the greatest problem of our time, and a most complex problem. Let the state it broadly."

"If we give complete military protection to the negro in all elections in South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana, where there is a large black majority, we shall establish a system of government which no white race on the face of this earth either ought to endure or will endure."

Mr. Redpath goes on to state that the alternative surrenders the States of South Carolina, Mississippi, and Louisiana "to the same brutal banditti who drove those communities into civil war." But in requesting your attention to this honest opinion of a well-known radical who has witnessed the facts of which he speaks, I have performed the duty I set myself, and have only to await the popular verdict of next month; hoping meantime THE INDEX will rely henceforth upon the judicial good sense of its own "R. C."

Yours for the rights of all,

ALBERT WARREN KELSEY.

THE ERRONEOUS READING OF "CURRENT EVENTS."

EDITOR INDEX:

As a close reader of your valuable journal, I have admired the free parliament afforded in your columns to diverse views upon all live topics. Nothing in the usually pungent criticisms on "Current Events," by "R. C.," has escaped me. The following, in the issue for October 12, appeals so strongly to my sense of justice, that I raise my voice, in testimony against the erroneous reading of current events it appears to convey in every sentence:—

"Judging from the tenor of many speeches and lectures delivered just subsequent to the civil war, it is evident that not a few excellent people then believed that the gift of the ballot would suddenly convert the Southern freedman into something resembling an angel of light. It is an extremely difficult matter, apparently, for people who became possessed of the above notion to understand that the facts of the past ten years prove conclusively that the freedman is very often a lying and thievish knave, and in many respects is more closely allied to a semi-barbarian than to any civilized being. That the Southern negroes are utterly incapable of self-government, we hold to be proved conclusively by the miserable condition of those States in which they have had longest and most exclusive control. So wretched, in fact, have been their attempts at government that throughout these States to-day the whites take no interest whatever in the questions which disturb our national politics. They care nothing about tariff, or resumption, or silver standard, or civil-service reform, and divide into no parties upon these questions. Parties are divided by the color line, and the whites are occupied solely with the desire of escaping from the rule of the negro and his coadjutor and fellow-scalawag, the carpet-bag white man. All sentiments of poetic justice must long ago have been satisfied by the twelve years' rule of the former slave over his master, and, for the best interests of both races, it is about time now for this unnatural order of things to be done away with."

I protest that few well-informed men could have expected the sudden "gift of the ballot" to convert the Southern freedmen into "angels of light," "opposition to slavery-extension being founded upon the fact that it condemned to ignorance and morally debased millions of blacks and whites in the Southern States. The ballot was given to the black in self-defence, and as a check to the defeated elements of treason. It was hoped the reverses of Southern leaders and the changed condition of the blacks would lead to alliances for their mutual benefit. The work of redeeming the South completely from the prejudices of race and disloyalty was confided to present and future generations. An heroic cure was provided for grievous wounds."

I protest against any attempt to cite the facts of the past ten years to prove conclusively that the negro is any better or worse than the average human being, or governed by any different motives of self-interest in any condition of life. I plead an experience of thirteen years as a teacher, editor, party-organizer, and an official representative of blacks, against the inhumanity of that kind of political thought which would attempt, if empowered, to reduce the blacks to political peonage, or slavery to the white race. I think of nothing, in all the long years of war and the mockery of peace which has continued to follow it, which should cause any friend of abolition or of the ballot to question the wisdom of the national record.

I cannot recall a moment when the agents of the Federal government were not considered as "tyrants over a conquered people," and the blacks an "inferior and debased people," and when the Confederate element did not desire the ascendancy, utterly careless of the proprieties observed in civilized States on a poll of their voters. I know the struggle is not between the elements of honesty and dishonesty in local government. South Carolina tells the story through her reform Governor, Daniel Chamberlain, whose Republican sympathies cannot be forgiven him. Do not be misled; be wary with that pen, "R. C." The same humane arguments we use in pleading the cause of freedom in religious are quite as needful in political affairs.

It is not time to experiment in "poetic feelings of justice," but rather to hold up the hands of the administrators of the law, and to hold fast to the decrees of the war, not allowing the diplomacy and the superior experience of the Southern whites to befog the national conscience on the negro question. Remember that two hundred thousand negroes carried muskets in the Union army, and they are ready to repeat the service, and may be needed in the near future. School-houses, wherever opened, are crowded with eager throngs of black children, and should be more plentiful. The remedy for Southern misgovernment is not of this day or generation. The harvest of two centuries of inhumanity is ungarnished. Meanwhile, let us have obedience to law, enforced probably by the bayonet; next, it may be acknowledged that a national system of compulsory education will suffice to meet all the demands of humanity in the premises.

Very respectfully,

EMERSON BENTLEY.

MORGAN CITY, La., Oct. 23, 1876.

[We accept Mr. Bentley's letter, which is as temperate in tone as it is wise in substance, as a very satisfactory statement of our own views on this subject. Especially do we approve the recommendation of "compulsory education," rather than any "white man's party," as the likeliest remedy for the troubles of the South.—ED.]

AN "ABOLITIONISTS" VIEW.

ROCK FALLS, Ill., Oct. 24, 1876.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

I heartily thank our friend, W. J. Potter, for his mild but merited rebuke of "R. C." I have been astonished and wounded at the expressions of this writer. If I had seen some of his paragraphs in pro-slavery Democratic papers, I should not have been surprised. Having been from my youth a warm friend of the colored man, and an humble soldier in that long moral conflict that preceded the downfall of the worst form of oppression that ever disgraced man, I can have no sympathy and but little patience with one whose predilections are on the side of the oppressor. It seems to me that THE INDEX will suffer much from the publication of "R. C.'s" articles. Every man has a right to speak his sentiments; but every man is not under an obligation to listen to them, nor pay for them, and I think you will find others who agree with me. I wish to see the manly battle you have waged against the encroachments theological bigots are making against religious freedom fought out on that line. But if it is mixed up with the advocacy of wrongs more grievous to be borne than any we have yet experienced at the hands of religious bigots, we shall lose much of our love and admiration for that paper.

Sincerely yours,

W. E. LUKENS.

AN EXTREMIST'S DECISION.

UPPER GLOUCESTER, Me., Oct. 23, 1876.

MR. EDITOR:—

The editorial in THE INDEX of the 19th instant is a word in due season. It has the right ring about it. Although it is too late to remedy the oversight of the Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, in neglecting to nominate a liberal ticket, it is not too late for each individual liberal to refrain from voting or to cast a vote of his own making-up.

The State of Maine is certain for Hayes by ten thousand majority at least, and therefore I for one shall continue to practice the policy of the Garrisonian abolitionists, and not vote at all.

In a State almost equally divided, a liberal ticket might have the effect to warn the other parties that the "Demands of Liberalism" are not to be despised, and in such a case the two parties should be made to know upon what terms either could have our votes,—although many in the present case will conclude of two evils to choose the least. As it is, no folly can be greater than for the liberals of this State to give their votes for either party, the most important thing being to make their action or non-action seen and felt; for non-action will be action in such a case.

There are no liberals here who will take the view of your humble servant, and there are but one or two who care enough about the question at all to read THE INDEX, much less take and pay for it. If there are, they have got to be found.

I have been a radical in all questions of reform, and have been counted as an extremist for more than forty years, and I intend to die in harness. As I can effect nothing more, I mean that all my neighbors shall know why I do not vote; and I only offer this encumbrance to the columns of THE INDEX in the hope that some of its readers may be influenced to pursue the same course.

I do not believe that the Christian Amendment, in any form, can pass at the next session of Congress. It could not again secure so large a vote in the Senate as it did last session. The question may be brought successfully before the people in its liberal aspect after the Presidential election. D. S. G.

RUFUS S. FROST.

TO LIBERALS WHO PROPOSE TO CAST A CONSISTENT VOTE:—

Many readers of THE INDEX in this vicinity will remember that, in 1874, they cast their votes against the Republican candidate in the Fourth Suffolk District, Rufus S. Frost, thinking and believing him to be in sympathy with the "Christian Amendment" party, whose aim it is to make the Constitution of our country Christian rather than secular, as it now is.

Knowing Mr. Frost to be an excellent and a true man, and one who would otherwise represent the district well, if elected, I, with others, felt called upon to ascertain his exact position, so that injustice should not be done him. Consequently, in a recent call upon him, I alluded to the efforts being made to introduce the name of God into the Constitution, and also to the so-called Blaine amendment, as passed by the House of Representatives and changed for the worse by the Senate, and asked for an expression of opinion on the same. To this, with evident emotion, he frankly replied that, while he honored and firmly believed in the God of his fathers, he was, and should be opposed to anything that looked like a union of Church and State. And he regarded the introduction of the word God into the Constitution as a step in that direction, and therefore to be opposed.

I am also happy to be able to report that, while speaking of the Bible in public schools, he took a very liberal and just view of the question, maintaining that our schools should be made and kept PERFECTLY SECULAR,—that being the only method of preserving them for all time intact.

This will be gratifying to his many liberal friends, who can and will now vote for him consistently.

Truly yours,

D. G. CRANDON.

CHELSEA, Mass., Oct. 28.

MR. H. L. GREEN.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I have just learned, and with deep regret, that Mr. H. L. Green has removed from our city and taken up his residence in Salamanca, N. Y.

Mr. Green has during the entire time of my acquaintance with him—and this extends now over many years—been one of the most devoted, self-sacrificing, tireless workers for the cause of spiritual emancipation and all practical reform that I have ever had the happiness to know. His activity in the establishment and maintenance of the Radical Club in this city, an organization which owed its birth to him, and whose life and soul he continued to be to the end, always infusing into it such measure of earnestness and love of truth and right as lay in his power,—in the maintenance of a Free Reading Room constantly open, and filled with papers and magazines of the first value so far as they could be commanded,—and his effective work generally throughout this vicinity in reaching, addressing, and arousing the liberally inclined and the thoughtful who might anywhere be drawn together, upon the issues of this hour,—all these and more are well known to those who have been familiar at all with the life of this devoted doer.

I beg to commend Mr. Green cordially to the confidence and hearty welcome of the liberal and progressive people in and throughout the region of his present home, and I trust they will avail themselves freely of the privilege of inviting him to address them and to aid them forward in the work of enlightenment and emancipation that presses so imperatively to be done at the present time.

Yours,

CHAS. D. B. MILLS.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 to 25 " " 8 " " "
 " 26 to 51 " " 6 " " "
 " 52 " " " 5 " " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debating character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER.

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!CHARTERS

For Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage, to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

A COLORED PREACHER said (or is reported to have said), at a recent political meeting in South Carolina, that Christ was a Republican, and was crucified by Democrats!

THE ELECTION is going on as we go to press, and its result will be known before this issue reaches the majority of our readers. Several communications on this subject are belated, and we are extremely sorry that it has been impossible to get them out in season; but the best of them we shall publish after the election. They are just as good to reflect upon.

THE STORY goes that some sailors, after discussing a new comet with considerable trepidation, came to the unanimous conclusion that it was "a star sprung a leak." This explanation applies to the Beechers, Murrys, Swings, and other half-liberal preachers whose doctrinal wanderings alarm the Orthodox. They are undoubtedly "stars," but, to judge by their cometary vagaries, merely stars which have "sprung a leak."

THIS WAS written on the back of the ballot we cast on the seventh of November: "I cannot vote the Democratic electoral ticket because I believe the Democratic party disloyal to the principle of national unity. I cannot vote the Republican electoral ticket because I believe the Republican party pledged to amend the Constitution in favor of Protestant Orthodoxy, and thus to unite Church and State. I am therefore obliged to cast this protest ballot for electors who are thoroughly loyal to the great principles of national unity and secular government at the same time. FRANCIS E. ABBOT." The only six names we substituted for the thirteen we erased were as follows: Samuel E. Sewall, Elizur Wright, W. J. Potter, M. J. Savage, William Lloyd Garrison, R. P. Halliwell.

IT IS STATED that "an estimable old lady, on her way to the Centennial by way of the Sound, produced her Bible immediately after going aboard the steamer at New London, and devoutly perused a chapter. Her appreciation of ensuing dangers and difficulties was made evident by the fact that she selected the first chapter of Genesis." There is something despicable in this attempt to make fun of the old lady. She was evidently a disciple of the Rev. Joseph Cook, and, having set out to improve her mind and being satisfied by her instructor that the first chapter of Genesis explained the beginning of all things, intended merely to consult the best authority on the question whether steamboats were originally created in the Garden of Eden, or might be conceded without danger to Orthodoxy to be lineal descendants of Mr. Darwin's horrid monkeys.

THE Catholic Review concedes that "no distinctively Protestant publication can be otherwise than immoral, because just in so far as it is Protestant it is so only by a formal denial of revealed truth as taught by the Church to whom God has intrusted his message to mankind. And as its only reason for existence is to spread a falsehood, it inevitably inculcates the most radical immorality." Catholicism teaches that it is immoral not to believe all that the Church declares to be true. Protestantism makes the same absurd assumption with regard to the Bible, and hence treats "Sabbath-breaking" as an "immorality." Seeing what useless burdens of this sort superstition has created and laid on human shoulders, we remember the saying: "Cursed be the man who invents a sin!"

IT WILL give very great pleasure to our readers, as it does to us, that we are permitted to announce Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton as a new "Editorial Contributor" of THE INDEX. Mrs. Stanton was one of the very earliest champions of woman's equality with man in all political or civil rights, and is to-day President of the National Woman Suffrage Association. Her reputation for character and capacity is national in extent, and she wears a veteran's crown of honor and grateful recognition from the hands of those for whom she has labored so faithfully and so long. It would be impossible for us to give a more convincing proof of the value of this new acquisition to our columns than by quoting these striking passages from Mrs. Stanton's very kind acceptance of our invitation, which are too profoundly wise and instructive to be buried in a merely private letter:—

"Woman is held in bondage to-day by the complete perversion of the religious element of her being. I have long seen this, and tried to do the best I could by liberal interpretations of the Bible; but that, I find, amounts to very little so long as the priest, with holy unction, teaches the opposite. I have travelled very extensively through the Western States, through California, Texas, etc. Everywhere the devotion of women to their churches is really pitiful; and when oppression is accepted as the will of God, where can we open the argument? A devout, complacent slave is as pitiful, as exasperating, whether on a Southern plantation or in an Orthodox congregation. I had thought that with political freedom woman might get rid of her superstition, as man has. Higher education in science and philosophy is doing something for the rising generation of girls; but, as you say, these religious superstitions make their subjection after all certain. There is not, I believe, an Orthodox woman on our platform: there may be, but I do not recall one just now. Now what can we do to get the suffrage movement 'out of the rats, and base it on universal truths'? The very idea you express of woman's ownership of herself we declared in the closing sentence of our Fourth of July Declaration. One thing we should do, and that is to identify ourselves with the struggle you and a few others are now making for free religion, to avert the danger to our schools, our Constitution, in fact to freedom in all directions. Though I am not well enough informed to write the articles referred to, yet I will write from time to time on anything suggested by the articles in your journal, which I read regularly with much pleasure. I am busy just now writing a history of the suffrage movement; when that is done, I intend to look into the religions and their effect on woman's condition. I have no objection to be enrolled among your correspondents."

Surely, a new day would dawn for women, if only a thousandth part of them were as wise for themselves as this true friend is wise for them!

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 8, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

A Plea for Freedom of Thought.

SUGGESTED BY "AIDS TO FAITH."

BY J. D. VAN DUZEN.

In these times we can truly say that Dogmatism, the ancient tyrant of the nations, is dead. He has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The sceptre has passed from his hands; his sovereignty has departed. He has been a royal master in his day, but we must leave him with the nations that are in eternal peace. Still, we shall claim the right to draw what succor for mankind we can from his history; his good results may be praised; the evil may be condemned that it may be avoided; and his high-handed misdemeanors may receive faithful exposition at the hands of the historian, that they may no longer awe by their authority, or attract by the splendor of their assumption, or by their plausibility.

We are asked if this king has left no successor. He has. Toleration has been duly announced from the balconies of the old palaces of power as the legitimate sovereign to rule in his stead. The people have acknowledged him, and his throne is set up in their midst. The pageant has passed, and the paths of commerce, industry, science, the arts, and literature are pursued with a lighter heart, a clearer brain, and a firmer tread for mankind.

Infinite assertion (pardon the phrase) was the only authority of the ancient Catholicism. The decrees of the Pope was the voice of heaven, and no power on earth could say nay and be heard. Such presumption, in thousands of recorded historical instances, was rewarded with the rack and the stake. No matter how natural it was for man to reason, to question the sacredness of that which did not seem sacred, he must not reason, he must not question. If he did, death was held up as the penalty. The word of the Church was not to be doubted or reasoned upon, because, if permitted to reason, the right of doubting was conceded, and with the right of doubting the right of believing the evidences that compelled to a conclusion antagonistic to that maintained by the Church. The reasoning must be left to the Bishop; the laity was only to exercise faith and worship God according to the decrees of a Council of Bishops.

This made Catholicism a military system, with all the rigors of military law in the discipline of the Church. It was the exact opposite of individualism; it denied to man the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of his own conscience. It stood between man and his God as a sacred and authoritative mediator, pretending to receive the will of God from heaven, and interpreting that will to man. It cut man off from God; it cut him off from communication with his own conscience and reason; it denied to him the use of these faculties in sacred matters; it reduced him to the position of the unreasoning animal; it deprived him of all high prerogatives of human intelligence in the most important and sacred interests of his existence.

Such a power was the natural enemy of intellectual advancement, of the natural exercise of the human reason in all its legitimate functions. Whenever thought commenced, there the power of the Pope and the authority of the Council of Bishops were shaken. If men would think, if reason would operate in human affairs in the world of faith as well as the world of physics, the authority of this tyrannical dogmatism must be disturbed. From this necessity for the preparation of the human reason to work, investigate, satisfy itself, Luther appeared, and the doors of Rome were sealed. The real work of Luther was not to introduce another infallible faith into the world than that promulgated at Rome, but to introduce greater freedom of religious thought, to break the old despotism which had long oppressed the nations.

Still, Luther did not complete the work he commenced. His work only substituted another despotism for one that had passed away, yet not so severe and completely intolerant. His despotism was tempered by greater liberalism, if the element of liberalism can be said to enter into a despotism. It could not be expected that Catholicism, which had contributed so much to the education of the age, could be wholly discarded. It had educated the world to certain modes of thought, to certain methods of worship, and it was impossible to dethrone them all absolutely and immediately. The foundations of Protestantism were laid more exclusively in Christ and in Scripture, and partook more of the pure morality and liberalism of their teachings. The men of that time did not understand civil liberty as they understand it now. Civil and religious liberty must go hand in hand; the one is not evolved from the other; the one is not the natural antecedent of the other. Both are the natural antagonism of political and religious despotism; both are founded upon the freedom of the individual will, of individual speculation, and individual opinions. Both are the natural result, as logical and legitimate as anything can be, of the natural individualism founded in the diverse characters of men. All men are born with diverse powers, diverse characters, diverse tendencies. Men are found everywhere differing in degrees of ability; indeed, no two men can be said to be born alike.

In the combination of individuals for a common purpose, the ancients, looking too much towards the accomplishment of the common purpose, lost sight of the individual, and suppressed him entirely in Church and State. This gave all authority into the hands of a few; the few dictated opinions and laws for the masses to follow, and all the individualism of the time was enveloped in the fortunate few who were possessed of power, and it was suppressed in the masses. Hence spiritual and political dogmatism and despotism were the legitimate result.

Men will investigate, think, compare; it is the natural effort of reason in self-development. This effort imposed the age of criticism upon the age of Luther, Calvin, and his theories. It imposed the law upon England, and that law is now the law of the Church and the State. Dissent introduced new churches, and aided independent thinkers to form around common centres and institute new organizations. But, in forming these new organizations, each adopted the old law of strict conformity as applicable to itself. This required it to anathematize, to excommunicate, to recognize those friendly and turn aside from those hostile to their peculiar faith. In truth, Protestantism, from the time of Luther to the present hour, has been dogmatic, exclusive, harsh, tyrannical in its theology. We can see no difference between the decrees of the Pope and the decrees of the village church, the decrees of the annual conference, or the decrees of the synod of Congregational ministers; all alike lay down the theological code; all alike forbid opposition; all alike threaten the displeasure of the Church upon those who question the wisdom or the truthfulness of its doctrines; all alike punish the sin of heresy, all condemn the infidel or the unbeliever; all alike hold up to the condemnation of good men the German rationalism which introduced freedom of discussion and thought.

There is another despotism that reigns in all the Protestant churches, of whatever denomination. It is a social despotism of opinion. Let the Churchman know a neighbor, whatever may be the virtues of his private character, who inclines to freedom of thought upon religious matters, and he repudiates him. The heretic is deprived of that social countenance which will sustain his moral character and minister to his sympathetic needs; he is looked upon with the eye of suspicion as a dangerous man; children and young men are taught to avoid him for fear of contamination. To a man of sensitive nature, this is a great tyranny, a deep sorrow. It cuts him off from pleasant relations in life; it wounds him in his family relations. This is not the spirit of Christ; it is not the true Christianity; it is one of the ancient barbarisms that must die out gradually with the emancipation of the human mind from the ancient tyrannies.

There can be no excuse for this proscription, a proscription that differs only in degree, and not in kind, from the spirit of persecution in the old Catholic Church. The Church cannot be maintained upon a more safe and healthy basis in consequence of it; on the other hand, the tendency is to call out the indignation and contempt of the better class of practical men in the world. If the Church could be maintained more securely, if the general morals of society were better sustained in consequence of this proscription, the sin might find some extenuation. But the spirit of the age is such that proscription is proscribed and intolerance not tolerated.

It cannot be denied that positivism is the leaning of the age. Men are beginning to believe only that which they know, and to receive no mere assertions of others. This is the influence of the great Baconian theory of induction. A large number of similar phenomena are classed together, and any relation common to them all is generalized as a new law. This is the principle in the discoveries of science, in mechanics, in all the operations of trade and commerce. It is the basis of all advancement in human experience, and every new accession of human knowledge is gained by the same process. This principle enters into the politics of the State, and the statesman feels his way along into the darkness ahead with the same caution that the scientific man and the philosopher use.

It is natural that this universal and positive habit of mind should extend itself into the spiritual knowledge of the world. The horizon of the material world is bounded by the spiritual. We can know the physical world; of the spiritual we know nothing save by inference. We do not know of its existence save by inference. We have had no message from it, save that which comes from the desires and hopes of the human breast. Angels are only imaginary creations. Their celestial habiliments float only in the human fancy; their personalities are always represented in likeness of man as painted upon the canvas of the artist or chiselled on the cold marble. The spirit world is but the natural world in which we live, reproduced in some superior locality with all the sin and sorrow left out.

The history of religious advancement is only the history of the moral development of the human race. What Athanasius or Chrysostom or Calvin taught is of no binding force upon me. I have no interest in it except as I have an interest in all facts of history. Of what binding force can be the announcements of Aristotle in politics, any farther than he announced absolute truths which have been sustained by the experience of mankind? Of no more binding force on me are the announcements of Luther, of Calvin, or of any modern dogmatist in theology. The authority of antiquity has no more binding effect upon the human mind in theology than in politics. That theology and that politics are the best for the moral welfare of the people which best suit their character and needs. Catholicism, it must be conceded, has been a blessing to millions, because it held them to some moral law and religious observance. As fast as their social needs pass beyond the ability of that Church to supply them, Catholicism must give way to some other religion. It is so with Protestantism; it is so with limited monarchies, absolutisms, or democracies.

In the last great defence of Protestantism written by some of the ablest men in the Church of England, history, with all the authorities of antiquity in full array, is marshalled to meet those who had ventured, though modestly, to speak kindly of some of the scepticisms of the day. It seems that they would rather compel assent by the number of great names than by the weight of their arguments. Professor Mansel, however, better than the others, apprehends the situation, and reasons more from obvious facts and acknowledged conclusions. Less than the others, he calls upon us to accept the teachings of the fathers of theology, and meets the practical mind of the day with arguments that will command respect and admiration, if they do not convince the judgment.

It is as certain to men now as it ever can be, that no dogmatic laws can be laid down in theology any more than in the State. The Church and its tenets are but the constitution of the moral State. That constitution, and the laws arising out of it, must change with the changing character of the people. The different churches are only minor States within the State; they minister to the moral, as the State ministers to the political, wants. They appeal to reverence, and the State to intellect. Both are human institutions; both are chargeable to meet the progressive developments of the human character, and the varying circumstances of a nation's history. Neither can claim absolute authority in this age any farther than the laws and principles and formularies that they have evolved have met the sanction of the universal sense of mankind. Sixteen hundred cannot precipitate itself upon nineteen hundred, and narrow and subdue it within the older limits. The year nineteen hundred has new facts to deal with, new people with different characters to govern, new wants to supply, new theories to elaborate in practical life, and a wider range of vision by the added experience of three centuries. Therefore sixteen hundred must fall back to its place, commended for the work which it has well done, but condemned for its usurpations of authority in a higher and broader present.

We are told that our argument is a fallacy, because the Church has a divine origin and speaks with the authority of inspiration. We reply, the State has as divine an origin, and speaks with an inspiration coming from as high a source as the Church. Law is law. It is the natural antagonist of confusion, dissolution, and death. It is the divine energy with which God holds this universe of multitudinous monads in harmony. By law he lifts the dead, dull weight of worlds into animation, and pours the beam of his intelligence through them, and lights them up with inexpressible grandeur and beauty. Law is his right arm; let it be withdrawn, and the inert mass falls dead. He has spoken the law for the Church; he alone has spoken the law for the State. Neither has come to us by a special revelation; both have come pencilled dimly in Nature, and in the heart of man. The great work of man is to bring them into light. One by one these laws have been clearly seen; one by one, through the long ages, they have been recorded in the human depositories of learning, and applied to all the arts of life; and one by one have they lifted the load from mortal shoulders, and elevated the brow and eye to the Supreme Law-giver and Power. Confucius, Zoroaster, Socrates and Seneca, Bacon and Luther,—each has had a common fountain from which to drink; each has raised his portion of the waters of immortality to the parched lips of mankind. The Church and the State, the expression of the moral and the intellectual faculties of man, have alike profited by their teachings.

We are told that this is assumption; that it is a relic of the old dogmatism whose death and burial we have just celebrated. No, this is not so. It is not assumption, it is not dogmatism. Let no advocate of the historic faith soothe himself with the reflection that he has discomfited us by his assertions. All the presumptions of Nature and of human experience are in our favor; the burden of proof is on him to show our error and his own truth. The most gigantic work that we can find to do is to emancipate the present from the imposed despotisms of the past. Precedent is good where the facts are the same, and where no new discoveries have been made. Precedent in English laws is followed only in cases exactly analogous; in such cases it is the mark of wisdom to follow it. But the religious wants of mankind grow out of the character of mankind, and that character is always changing with the advance of years.

The kind of religion is not so essential as that we have religion of some kind. Man must express himself in some religious form, as the seed planted must express itself in the flower; hence prayer, and the erection of temples of worship, and the formularies of the Church under the law of association for a common purpose. These have erected themselves into authority, and that authority will not admit of a change. The Church falls back upon infallible inspiration; but we place this out of the argument.

A new promulgation of this authority comes from the Lord Bishop of Oxford. The Essays and Reviews presume to doubt. The Lord Bishop of Oxford pronounces "the distinct, solemn, and, if need be, severe decision of authority that assertions such as these cannot be put forward as possibly true, or even advanced as admitting of question, by honest men who are bound by voluntary obligations to teach the Christian revelation as the truth of God." He claims that, if these matters "are admitted by us to be open questions among men under such obligations, we shall leave to the next generation the fatal legacy of a universal scepticism." He says further that "we need the calm, comprehensive, scholarly declaration of positive truth upon all the matters in dispute." He would not allow dispute; he would not permit questionings upon fundamental principles. Can he help it? He will not consent that these fundamental questions shall remain "open questions." We ask again, can he help it? No, not while a doubt remains unsettled; not while the shadow of a doubt is left in the vast field of the historical origin of Christianity. Men will question all things that are not absolutely proven. It is his nature that he should question; his reason cannot operate, cannot discover, cannot advance unless he does question. A few facts are settled in the material world; those will not be questioned. That the sun shines, that water runs down hill, that two and two make four, are unquestionable propositions. We never see two sane philosophers discussing the point whether these propositions are true or not. The best form of government, the age of the world, the mosaic cosmogony, plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, and the most efficient cannon for naval warfare, are still open questions with the mass of mankind, and, being such, men will discuss them. We cannot see how my Lord Bishop of Oxford can justly or possibly prevent it.

But he comes forward and replies: "No, I do not wish or seek to prevent this universally. I say that those who voluntarily assume the position of Christian teachers must question no longer." This is not the point. We who are not of the Church of England do not wish to inquire into your Church regulations, requirements, and government; but the moment that you assume that all you teach is absolute and therefore unquestionable truth, that moment we say you overstep the bounds of moral or religious teachers, because you teach that which you do not know. If you will say that such and such is the faith of the Church of England, and then give satisfactory evidences of your faith, we will recognize you as within your legitimate province, and accept you as one of the lights of the world, worthy to be followed so far as you declare the truth.

The Lord Bishop of Oxford is behind the age when he will not permit men to doubt and question. No Church, no State, no creed, no institution, no mechanical science, and no industrial enterprise can advance, if doubting and questioning are stopped. This is clapping the padlock upon human reason; it is saying to the sun, Stand still; it is saying to universal vegetation, Cease development this instant, and stand forever ice-locked. The old theologies have done good work, but they must give way to new ones if they would meet the progressive wants of mankind. The stolid calm of the East cannot fall upon the West; agitation and movement have entered into the spirit of the West, and intellectual rest is impossible.

When German rationalism or English scepticism question, they do it, not to destroy religion from the face of the earth, but to reconcile it to the age.

Socrates was a better man, and Seneca was a wiser teacher of human morals, than Calvin. The Grecian and the Roman, though called heathens, never would have burned Servetus at the stake for heresy. All the scepticism and rationalism of the age that commands the respect of a reasoning man recognize the virtues of Christianity, but they cannot love her theology.

And what do we observe? It is this: that theology is sustained, not by reasoning men in their unassociated capacity, but by churches as a system. They have a system to maintain, hence call upon authority to assist them. The great names of antiquity, with all their regal splendor of great intellect, and the cities, churches, peoples of the past, are called upon to give a testimony and a law to the nineteenth century. Let us look at the hearts of those who summon this cloud of witnesses, and we shall find that they fight, not to sustain a faltering individual opinion, but to prop an attacked system and keep it from crumbling to ruin in their hands. Here the motive is ill; it is not genuinely honest, though it dwells in a heart that beats beneath the immaculate robes of a bishop.

The Lord Bishop of Oxford would settle the theological difficulties of any mind "rather by strengthening the deep foundations of faith than by the labored refutation of every separate captious and casuistic objection." This is all we desire to settle the faith. The Church holds so tenaciously to its old position that we cannot settle the faith. This is apt to be overlooked by the Church teachers. Faith is the result of character, and character is always determined by two motor-powers, the passionate and the rationalistic tendencies. The one feels and follows without thought, and the other never moves save under a sure mental conviction. The first will easily fall under the sceptre of the bishop and cast out the seven devils of German rationalism and English scepticism; it will never be troubled with casuistic objections, because it never will listen to them, and the deep foundations of its faith will be strengthened because its nature gravitates in that direction. It has faith because it cannot help it,—a faith profound because it never questions it, and stable because it will never permit it to be questioned. The ichthyosaurus has clothed himself in a Silurian mail, gone to sleep on his primitive soil, and will not be resurrected by the startling blast of the new trumpet of the age.

But those who are characterized by the rationalistic tendency could not, if they would, have the deep foundations of their faith strengthened before the reason is convinced. They could not arrive at a profound faith save through the operations of reason. Thought, with them, is the first necessity of existence; it is always antecedent to the will, and determines the will.

Such men have few prejudices, but they have firm convictions when they have any at all. Every "casuistic objection" defeats them, if they cannot defeat it in return. They cannot shut their eyes to it, if they would; they have no control of their own opinions,—their opinions are always in the hands of the evidences presented to them. If they ever adhere to a system, it is from a necessity, and not from an inclination. The evidences must be presented to such minds; then they will believe, and not before. To such men the Lord Bishop of Oxford must present unquestioned facts; then they will become the adherents of his faith.

The noble bishop says this conflict between the new rationalism and the Church of England faith is "simple unbelief." It is pantheism on the one hand and athelam on the other. He says that the strong foundation of the English Church stands firmly against this wide-spread current of thought.

Undoubtedly it does. The Church plants itself upon ideas advanced many centuries since, and these questioning minds in all honesty fail to discover "primitive truth" in them. But if the bishop sees it, he is also determined that they too shall see it.

There is something antagonistic to all this in human nature. Our opinions seem to us as our private property, a something nearer and dearer than all personal property, and we cannot consent that any man, any body of men, any institution or system, shall control them. We hold them as one of the inestimable gifts of our natures, and we alone can possess exclusive power over them. We cannot yield them to our Church, our State, our country; we can yield them to nothing. But when we act upon them, then we are forever modifying them to effect a common purpose with others.

The Bishop of Oxford would not have the truth die out among men; neither would we. But he would use the force of authority to maintain men in the position of being its advocates. We would not do that. The truth is invincible; and will maintain itself. It is not necessary that the power of the sword, or of denunciation, or excommunication should be used to sustain it. If gentlemen cannot believe the Thirty-nine Articles, they should not teach them; but they should be dealt with, not as criminals, but as men and equals, having a difference of opinion only that ought to be respected.

Essays and Reviews has brought a new phase of unbelief before the world; not so new in its theories as new in its modes of presentation. It does not come to us with coarse personalities and flippant jeers. They come "in more decent garments and more comely features"; they do not come from unprincipled adventurers and wild speculators, but from chaplains-in-ordinary to the Queen, professors of Hebrew in national colleges, professors of mathematics in Oxford, and professors of Greek in the same university. If the Church of England is attacked here, it is attacked by enemies nourished in its own bosom; if Christianity is assailed, it is assailed by those who bring the authority of experience and of acknowledged erudition to assist them.

These gentlemen do not assail Christianity as a system of ethics; they do not lay the weight of a finger upon Christianity as a living faith for the regeneration of the race; but they give respectful consideration to the doubts which come as a necessity from the high state of the rationalism of the age. It is not becoming in the Lord Bishop of Oxford to say that "shallowness," "passion," and "ignorance" characterize the efforts of men occupying these positions.

As he says, this form of attack, if attack he will persist in calling it, is more dangerous than the open atheism of the last age; we are pleased to have our doubts of an accepted system sustained by those high in authority and ripe in learning. Our enemies cannot point to their lives as a refutation of their teachings, or to their example as a blot upon the morality and the virtues of human nature.

This is not the least part of their power as against the ancient theology. They bring to bear a deep research and a sharp critical acumen that are not to be dealt with save with respect by those in the opposition. If these men range themselves by the side of the German rationalists, these rationalists will be raised into a dignity and consideration that they never enjoyed before in Great Britain. Doubt is the chronic state of the practical English mind to-day,—of that mind that is foremost in the enterprises of plith and moment among the people. Had it not been for the tenacity, and the centralization, and the weight of authority with which the Church of England has held its position and maintained its influence over the minds of the people, the rationalism of the age would have long since been openly acknowledged and generally accepted.

What is the current of the thought of the age, its direction, depth, strength? Or have we no general tendency of thought, and are all things moving by chance rather than by law? If a higher law exists, if that current of thought exists, and if in its natural course it bears against Church systems, State systems, and time-honored institutions which have been the bulwark and the solace of the past, these must give way gradually to insurmountable pressure. That current will not cease for a name, for a love, for a prejudice, for an edict or a law. One nation cannot make it pause; the decrees of kings cannot turn its course; the will of nations cannot suppress its influences. There is such a law, and its power is mighty. It is the law of material utility. It works by the unerring process of induction. The Saxon race is its highest exponent, and through that race it will regenerate the material, political, and moral character of the world. The logical characteristic of this material utility is positivism. It proves all things, and accepts nothing which is not proven. This is the intellectual result, and it passes beyond the intellectual into the moral sphere, and applies the same positivism to the problems of religion.

A habit of mind in the investigation of truth is the result of education. This habit is inexorable in its hold upon the man; it cannot be changed by the will. Bacon could not have investigated after the metaphysical method, nor the deductive; he could not have dogmatized. No man can force himself to believe that which is not proven to him. His educated and habitual mode of coming to conclusions must be pursued at all times when a subject is presented to him for investigation. His will cannot emancipate him from the dominion of his intellect; as far as his conclusions are concerned, he is the slave of his intellect.

The swift energy of the age, the uncompromising determination in all men to grow rich, to acquire wealth and power, have made them trust nothing which they could not prove to be permanent. This habit of mind will intrude itself upon the subject of religion, and nothing in the divine sphere will be accepted as true, without the presentation of positive evidence. This accounts for the scepticism of the age to a great extent. Men apply severe tests to all propositions touching the other life. They will believe in nothing that is not proven. Doubt comes to be the natural state of mind. All things rise up in antagonism to it, and it will accept none as friends until they are stripped of caprice or ignorance.

No man will believe that the balloon and telegraph will work miracles in conveying intelligence, and no man will believe the Jewish cosmogony until the material evidences presented are beyond contradiction; men will believe the modern geologist, with his facts placed before them, sooner than the ancient historians.

Therefore freedom of religious opinion, as well as freedom of opinion in all the other matters of politics, science, and material life, must be conceded. Theology stands still while the race is advancing, only falls into neglect first, and contempt afterwards; it ceases to be a living stream and a regenerator of social life, or a pillar to the State.

The ancient fetters forged by men less intelligent than ourselves are fast being broken; science has dissipated the prestige of superstition; natural philosophy has eliminated truth from a multitude of false beliefs; and political liberty has unsettled the old despotism that was founded on the accidents of birth. Everywhere the people are advancing to new light and to higher thought. In theology alone do we find a despotism that is unyielding, a power inexorable, a persecution malignant for the sin of unbelief.

There is no remedy; the Church system, if it does not yield to the pressure, will crack and crumble into fragments. A new Phoenix will rise from the ashes of the old. The world cannot live without the ethics of Christianity; it will not live with the old theologies of Christianity; so let them draw their garments about them, like Cæsar, and die decently.

THE FUNERAL OF RALPH H. RANNEY.

SPECIALLY REPORTED FOR "THE INDEX."

The funeral services over the remains of Mr. Ralph H. Ranney took place at Parker Memorial Hall, Boston, on Thursday, November 2. The family of Mr. Ranney and a large number of his friends and acquaintances (not less than one hundred and fifty in all) were in attendance. The remains, enclosed in a rosewood casket, were deposited in the lower hall at nine o'clock, A.M., and the services began a few minutes later. On the desk was a beautiful bouquet of rosebuds, the farewell offering of Mr. Photius Flek.

Mr. F. E. Abbot read the following hymn, which was beautifully sung by the Parker Fraternity Quartette:—

HYMN.

Hast thou, 'midst life's empty noises,
Heard the solemn steps of Time,
And the low mysterious voices
Of another clime?
Early hath life's mighty question
Thrilled within thy heart of youth,
With a deep and strong beseeching—
What, and where, is Truth?
Nor to ease and aimless quiet
Doth the inward answer tend;
But to works of love and duty,
As our being's end—
Earnest toil and strong endeavor
Of a spirit which, within,
Wrestles with familiar evil
And besetting sin;
And, without, with tireless vigor,
Steady heart, and purpose strong,
In the power of Truth assailed
Every form of wrong.

Mr. Abbot then read the following selections from the Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus:—

SELECTIONS.

"Of human life the time is a point, and the substance is in a flux, and the perception dull, and the composition of the whole body subject to putrefaction, and the soul a whirl, and fortune hard to divine, and fame a thing devoid of judgment. And, to say all in a word, everything which belongs to the body is a stream, and what belongs to the soul is a dream and vapor, and life is a warfare and a stranger's sojourn, and after-fame is oblivion. What, then, is that which is able to conduct a man? One thing, and only one,—philosophy. But this consists in keeping the daemon within a man free from violence and unharmed, superior to pains and pleasures, doing nothing without a purpose, nor yet falsely and with hypocrisy, not feeling the need of another man's doing or not doing anything; and, besides, accepting all that happens, and all that is allotted, as coming from thence, wherever it is, from whence he himself came; and, finally, waiting for death with a cheerful mind, as being nothing else than a dissolution of the elements of which every living being is compounded. But if there is no harm to the elements themselves in each continually changing into another, why should a man have any apprehension about the change and dissolution of all the elements? For it is according to Nature, and nothing is evil which is according to Nature.

"Body, soul, intelligence: to the body belong sensations, to the soul appetites, to the intelligence principles. To receive the impressions of forms by means of appearances belongs even to animals; to be pulled by the strings of desire belongs both to animals and to men who have made themselves into women, and to a Phalaris and a Nero; and to have the intelligence that guides to the things which appear suitable belongs also to those who . . . betray their country and do their impure deeds when they have shut the doors. If, then, everything else is common to all that I have mentioned, there remains that which is peculiar to the good man, to be pleased and content with what happens, and with the thread which is spun for him; and not to defile the divinity which is planted in his breast, nor disturb it by a crowd of images, but to preserve it tranquil, following it obediently as a god, neither saying anything contrary to the truth, nor doing anything contrary to justice. And if all men refuse to believe that he lives a simple, modest, and contented life, he is neither angry with any of them, nor does he deviate from the way which leads to the end of life, to which a man ought to come pure, tranquil, ready to depart, and without any compulsion perfectly reconciled to his lot."

Upon concluding the above selections, Mr. Abbot read as follows another hymn, which was sweetly sung by the quartette:—

HYMN.

Out of the dark the circling sphere
Is rounding onward to the light;
We see not yet the full day here,
But we do see the paling night;
And Hope, that lights her fadeless fires,
And Faith, that shines, a heavenly will,
And Love, that courage re-inspires,—
These stars have been above us still.
O sentinels, whose tread we heard
Through long hours when we could not see!
Pause now—exchange with cheer the word,
The unchanging watchword, LIBERTY!

Mr. Abbot then addressed the assemblage as follows:—

ADDRESS OF FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

NEIGHBORS AND FRIENDS:—It seems like some distressing dream that we should be here to-day. I can scarcely persuade myself that it will not pass away, and that we shall meet our friend again, and press his hand, and look into his kindly eyes, and sun ourselves in his cheerful smile, and hear his friendly words. But the facts of life must be met, and this one we must meet. I confess to you frankly, I shrank from the duty which was imposed upon me to speak to you to-day. [At this point Mr. Abbot paused in his remarks, being quite overcome by his feelings.] But I must discharge this debt owed to our friend. He has laid many of us under obligation, and it is the part of manhood to discharge that duty. This man laid not merely private friends under obligation, but he has laid the whole world under obligation in a way the world will probably never know. He has given himself, in the most quiet, modest, and retiring way, to public work whose consequences neither you nor I can foresee to-day. He has given labor, he has given time, he has devoted energy, he has spent more money than he should have spent, he has given all that lay in his power to the cause of human liberty, the cause of freethought, the cause of liberal ideas, the cause of genuine religion in this world. And I say here beside his silent form what I should never have said while he lived to hear, that he is one of the heroes of the new religion of this age, without pretension, or assumption, or ostentation; a man standing quietly at his post, but doing his duty in man-fashion, liberal, broad, generous, gentle, just.

Of his intellectual power I have a right to speak; for I have conversed many and many a time with him, and been astonished at the profound intellectual penetration he showed, the broad grasp of mind, the complete comprehension of great public questions, the deep insight into tendencies at work to-day which so few understand. I can say in all sincerity and truth that I have never met a mind that impressed me more with respect for its native power,—somewhat undisciplined and untrained, perhaps, not developed as a complete collegiate education would have developed it, but a mind whose native power of thought was certainly equal to that of any man I have ever met. And not only that, but he conjoined with this intellectual ability a practical sagacity and executive activity which made him one of the most useful men that could possibly be found in the cause to which he and I had mutually given ourselves—I mean the cause of the Liberal League movement. This our friend understood and comprehended in all its breadth, and he felt powerfully the mighty importance of it. Where so many are blind, he saw with an eagle eye; where so many are inert and apathetic, he gave the whole energy of his nature; where so many hold back and care little because their personal interests are not at stake, he gave the full measure of unselfish and generous devotion to the public cause. Therefore I say that he has earned a gratitude which he can never receive, because the world will never know the debt it owes to this modest and self-sacrificing man.

But not only was he great, in the true sense of that word, in his intellectual and his active nature, but he was just as great in his moral nature. I never knew a man more just, more discriminating, more upright than he. No partiality for—no prejudice against—any man, no matter who, could swerve his clear moral sense into an erroneous judgment. If I ever was wrong, I could get no sanction from him; if I was right, there was no danger that he would not be at my side. His moral insight, his justice, his sagacity in all that concerned moral distinctions, was supreme; it was almost infallible, and I had as great reverence for his verdict on character and on conduct as I have for that of any man living.

And, withal, he was so amiable, so kindly, so gentle, so good, so free from passion, so candid, so quick to do justice to those who thought differently,—he was so full of the milk of human kindness, so sweet and lovely in his life and temper, that I am sure no one who knew him could possibly withhold the tribute of a profound affection. I have known him now for only some four or five years, but in these few years this man stole so quietly into my heart that I hardly knew how much I loved him until I saw him here.

There was something about our friend that was so self-poised and self-contained that I am sure he would have maintained his equanimity under any and all circumstances. He had not what the world calls a religious faith; he was what the world calls an atheist. He never dogmatized; he never affirmed positively that there is no God; he knew that such an affirmation was beyond the reach of human wisdom. But he never believed in a God,—he never believed in the immortality of the soul,—after he came to years of thought. Many and many a long hour have I spent with him after his daily work was done, in the twilight, conversing on this subject. He and I did not think alike; I believe in God,—all the more because this man has lived, all the more because I have seen his fidelity, his truthfulness, his goodness, his power to obey his own ideal even in the absence of all these beliefs which the world calls essential. Many and many a time have we talked on these great themes, he arguing against, and I arguing for, belief in universal and all-pervading Intelligence; but we never quarrelled, we never lost respect for each other, there never was an unkind tone on either side. I am sure that he met me and I met him on the common plane of the love of truth; and he talked so fairly and so candidly, without the least wish to evade or to dodge in any way, or to cover up a point that seemed to tell against him, that I was smitten with admiration for the moral and mental character of the man. If ever a man loved the truth with a whole, undivided love, that man was Ralph H. Ranney. And because he and I differed, I think it right to say here that he died without the shadow of a hope of a future life, or belief in any supreme Intelligence governing this universe. Let him bear his testimony to his own thought; it was not mine, but he may be right and I may be wrong, or he may be wrong and I may be right—who of us is so wise as to tell? I say it is due to truth and justice that the testimony of that upright life, that noble and spotless character, should be given to the truth as he held it, not as I hold it. Therefore I tell what I have told of his opinions that there may be no misrepresentation or mistake hereafter,—that his opinions may have exactly as much weight as is their just due from the testimony of the character he bore and the love that he has left and the intellect that he was.

Friends, he did not look for another life. I always told him I did not know, but I hoped; and I tell you to-day that that hope is undimmed. It glows all the stronger because of this man's life. If the universe can produce such a pure and glorious life as that, such a bright torch of truth-loving in a world which cares so little for great principles, so little for goodness,—if the torch of this sweet and earnest soul can burn so brightly, I, for one, believe that that light came from some source higher than the mere unthinking matter that we see about us, and I hope that its glow will continue even after it has passed from our sight. I cannot help it,—that is what I believe, and all the more because such men as this can live such lives.

A faithful son, a faithful husband, a faithful father, a faithful friend, a faithful man of business, a faithful man in every relation as far as I can tell,—that was Ralph H. Ranney. I suppose every man has his faults; we must take that for granted; but I tell you frankly, friends, that, if this man had faults, I know not what they were. I never saw them. He was to me as nearly a faultless man as I ever have met in my life; and with full heart I bear this testimony of one who has seen him in his outgoings and incomings for the last four years, that his life was beautiful—full of gentleness, full of bravery, full of goodness. He has written his name on every heart that knew him in letters deep and ineffaceable!

It would have been our friend's wish, I am sure, to hear from Mr. Horace Seaver. If he is in the room, will Mr. Seaver say something of our friend?

Mr. Seaver arose, and, ascending the platform, responded with the following tribute:—

ADDRESS OF HORACE SEAVER.

MY FRIENDS:—I can add nothing to the very beautiful, just, and candid address that we have heard; but, as I have been very kindly requested to make some remarks upon this occasion, I am glad, though it is a sad duty, to pay a parting tribute of respect and friendship to our departed brother, and to mingle my sympathies with those of his afflicted family, his relatives and friends, in their sudden and painful bereavement. I am sure that we all sincerely sympathize with them, for we are all mourners here to-day. Although I would not intrude upon the sanctity of their private affairs, I hope it may be some mitigation of the anguish of his afflicted family to know that he was respected and admired by all who knew him, and that the regrets which his premature death have occasioned are those of the warmest sincerity. I have had the pleasure of being acquainted with Mr. Ranney for a number of years; and while I am aware that he cannot heed my praise now, and that I ought not to pour any unmeaning eulogy into the dull, cold ear of death, yet I cannot refrain from saying what I who knew him know, that he was a young man of superior intelligence, great promise, and remarkably correct habits; whose object and aim in life was to lead a useful, practical, honest, moral, and honorable career, and in this high cause he succeeded, as all his associates will bear witness. There are those, my friends, who, when they pass away, their lives having been such that we can say little or nothing of them,—all that we can do is to throw the mantle of charity over their memory, and let them pass on to silence and oblivion. But in the case of our friend, as has been well remarked, there was a great deal to admire, and nothing I know of to censure. I will speak of him as I knew him, for at a time like this, though nothing should be done for the purpose of vainglory, we should always give credit where credit is due. I remember reading once an anecdote of Cromwell to this effect, that, when sitting for his portrait, the painter asked if he should flatter him. "No, no," said the sturdy Republican; "paint me as I am." Remembering the admonition, I would speak of our friend as he always appeared to me, because a good life always deserves to be honored and respected. As you have heard remarked to-day, he was not a believer in creeds or dogmas, and made no professions; but he had what was much better, the good life:—

"For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
He can not be wrong whose life is in the right."

The life of our friend was right, as his character and conduct, which are everything, proved to all who knew him. Had he been, like many other young men, ambitious of wealth or political distinction, he could have obtained both, for he possessed rare ability, and he also had courage, determination, perseverance, industry, activity, zeal, earnestness, energy, and enthusiasm,—all those qualities which conduct to the front in the race for preferment. But his mission and thoughts and efforts lay in another direction, and so he joined himself to the unpopular party of progress or reform, and labored for the benefit of humanity and the promotion of liberty, of freethought, free speech, liberality, equal and just rights for all. In this good cause he worked faithfully, long, and well.

We shall all miss him, his attractive and intelligent presence, his friendly greeting, his open hand, his most unassuming and pleasing manner, and lament that it has come to this. He should, I think, have died hereafter. There would have been a time for that, but not now, when in the flower of his existence, and when he had so much to live for, and life was unfolding to him its brightest pages, and his services were so much needed.

I presume, my friends, that his peculiar ideas of religion were like my own, from conversations which I have had with him; and if in his loss I could see anything like "design," it would seem to me to be unjust. The suffering, the pain, the anguish, and orphanage occasioned by his death can hardly be right. Then I believe, as I presume you do, that those who administer joy, happiness, contentment, and comfort in this world are our best benefactors; but, be that as it may, it is a subject I am entirely unable to comprehend, and do not attempt it, and therefore I can only say, as I used to hear him say, that it seemed to be enveloped in doubt and darkness. But as for him, whose life was so good and useful, his memory will not moulder with his ashes; and when time shall have assuaged the anguish caused by this blow, he will be appreciated at his true value. Then it will be found, as our friend Abbot has wisely said, that he was one of the best and most promising young men of his time. We bid him farewell with feelings of sorrow, but at the same time with feelings of pride and satisfaction. We are glad that he lived so well. Though he has departed young, he has illustrated that excellent principle, that "the life is long which answers right's best end." He did his duty, improved his ability and opportunities to the best of his power, was always faithful to his own convictions of right and duty; and he leaves after him the immortality of a good name and the influence of a pure and upright example.

Mr. Abbot then said: "If Mr. Gannett is in the room, will he not please say a few words?"

Mr. Gannett then came forward, and, standing by the casket, spoke as follows:—

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM C. GANNETT.

I cannot speak, friends, as one who knew this man. I never knew him save as we know a hundred men. I knew him through others; I knew him by his cheerful, pleasant greeting once or twice. At the death of many, those who speak in praise of the departed are wont to speak of the things that they believed. Here to-day I noticed that those who spoke in praise have spoken of the things he did not believe, not slightly, but dwelling on them. I cannot help thinking that in this respect the Orthodox are right. It is not what a man does not believe, but what he does believe, that makes him great, that gives him force; and it is not because this man did not believe in God, did not believe in immortality, but because he did believe in truth, because he did believe in right, because he did believe in goodness, without those arguments which most men think are the basis of faith, that we now honor him. He had a mighty faith, but of that kind which made him go and do the goodness which he did not believe in. It is because of this that this man was great, and that you business men have stopped your business to come here at this hour of the day. Let every man be true to himself,—so he would have said; and, therefore, as I cannot speak as one who knows him, to me it seems most natural, standing here by his side, to simply close my eyes and open my thoughts, and, forgetting ourselves, to remember that great Life in which we live and die, and which we may call the Father, or call the Unknown, and it makes no matter what.

God of the many names or of the no name! We face thee; we stand here, and the touch, and the sight, and the stillness of this friend make us feel that we are children on the beach of a mighty ocean; and we gaze out, and see not where it goes. And then we remember that behind us is the other ocean, and we came over it and we know not whither it stretches, and we round our ignorance and our knowledge by saying, life. But while we claim it and move our hands, and move our lips, and think our thoughts, O God, we know not what it is, what we are, what Thou art; we don't know what we shall be, and yet we trust. We have that trust, even when we cannot put our trust in words or thoughts. We have this thing in us which makes us do the right against the men who do the wrong, against the ways that would serve us best,—this thing in us that makes us do what is right, live out unselfish lives, be pure, be helpful, be strong and cheerful under burdens. We think, indeed, we are trusting to goodness when we are so loyal to it,—that our loyalty bespeaks a deeper faith than our words can frame, a deeper faith than our lips can state in argument. Father, we thank Thee with all our souls that there are men who, as they live, and as the days and years go by, deepen our faith in right, deepen our trust in goodness; and this very day is brighter and softer because our friend has been in the days before. To-morrow, with all its darkness to some, will be the brighter because of what is left behind to-day, and because this has been a day of sunlight to cheer and help in its going by. And so we thank Thee, O our Life, that this little life has bequeathed us trust and an example that shames us out of impureness—shames us into unselfishness and greater pureness, and makes us try to be like Thee. Father, in our doubt, we thy children cry to the deepest and highest thing in ourselves, and some of us call that deepest and highest thing goodness, and, standing here, by one who has lived it, we feel like bending ourselves before that altar of Life and trying in our simple way, and as private men or private women, to live, broadening our little path as he did, not for the simple self, but for the greater self of our town, our people, and our age. Help us (shall we say?) as he has helped us; and we earnestly wish that we may go out, and, finding the day glad to us, use it truly, loyally, and unselfishly. And in this faith which is greater than our thought, in this trust which our minds do not pretend to face, in this trust, and in this loyalty, we would go out and be again what he has ceased to be, a life to help, the pleasant greeting, the one who stands on the helpful side, and we would work heartily to fill the gap that he has made. Help us, if Thou helpest men and women, and let his force go into us, if that may ever be. We know not what we say, and yet, O God, we know that life and all the sources of life are infinite. We don't know anything we can say of this. So, Father, we leave him as we leave ourselves to Thee. We know what he thought; we know not what he thinks. We know what he was; we know not what he is. O God, the deeper thought is, we know not what he was; we know not what we are. But through Thee, who art the life of this blue day, who art the very stillness of his face, who art the very thought within our thought, we leave it all, giving Thee no name, giving our own faith no name, but saying that we are children before Thee, and trust Thee utterly.

The services were then concluded with singing this parting hymn:—

BENEDICTION.

Part in peace—with deep thanksgiving,
Rendering, as we homeward tread,
Glad service to the living,
Tranquil memory to the dead!

The friends present were given an opportunity to take a last look upon the remains of Mr. Ranney; after which the casket was closed, and the body, accompanied by friends, conveyed to the Fitchburg Railroad station, to be taken to Ashfield, Massachusetts, where it was interred.

THE POPE'S SUCCESSOR.

For nearly a thousand years the Roman Pontiff was chosen by the suffrages of the civic magistrates, the people, and the clergy of Rome, in whom alone the elective franchise had become vested. It is true that their choice was not always a free one, the turbulent barons of the Eternal City of the neighboring towns often dictating to the voters or corrupting them, and from the beginning of the eleventh century, the emperors of Germany seeking to control the election. It was, doubtless, with the view of destroying the influence of the imperial party in future Papal elections that Hildebrand prevailed upon Nicholas II. to issue, in 1059, his memorable bull conferring the franchise upon the Cardinals exclusively, by whom it has ever since been exercised. As more than three-fourths of the Sacred College are Italians, their choice is apt to fall on one of their countrymen; and, in point of fact, it is now more than three centuries since any other than an Italian has filled the Papal throne. The limitation of the suffrage to the wearers of the red hat has, however, been regarded by some Catholics with disfavor, and not long since a society was formed in Italy with the avowed purpose of "vindictating the rights of Christians generally, and the Romans particularly, in electing the next Pope." Only a few weeks since it was announced that Pius IX. regarded the members of this society as having incurred the greater excommunication, a peculiarly severe form of ecclesiastical censure reserved by the Pontiff for extreme emergencies. But the efforts of the innovators would seem, from a telegram received yesterday from Rome, not to have been without influence on the Sacred College itself, for a convocation of Cardinals is now holding in Rome with the view of ascertaining the feasibility of introducing certain modifications in the system of election, so that the electors may exercise full liberty when a successor to Pius IX. is to be chosen. Of course the Cardinals will always retain the franchise, and it will never be restricted again to the Roman community; but the agitation may bring about the choice of a Spaniard, an Austrian, or a Frenchman at the next Papal election.—*N. Poetry.

RALPH H. RANNEY:

OCTOBER 29, 1876.

And whither now, O true friend,—who left,
Ere we surmised thou hadst the thought, to sail
Alone thy bark for realms unseen—heretofore
Us ere sad hearts surprised could lips farewell,
Or whisper cheer,—ah, whither now prevail
Thy feet? Thou wilt not turn and glibly tell
The mystery to ears of mortal clay?
We ask it not. But we will follow thee
With pure affection's light, for well we may Indulge prophetic love, thus much to see:
Roam where thou wilt through the far universe,
Thou canst not fall meet souls who will rehearse,
Each unto each, the story of thy worth.
Press on—we give thee joy of thy new birth.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY?

A Convention on the Sunday-Observance Question is to be held under the auspices of the Free Religious Association in Boston, at Beethoven Hall, on Wednesday, Nov. 15, through the day and evening. The various aspects of the question—Scriptural, historical, legal, educational, and sanitary—will be discussed in essays and addresses by able speakers. The newly awakened interest in the subject, it is expected, will call out a large meeting. For further particulars see the Boston daily papers.

WM. J. POTTER, Secretary.

THE FUNERAL of Mr. Ranney has been very faithfully reported for our readers, that here, in THE INDEX he loved so well and served so unselfishly, there may be a modest monument to his memory. But, alas, set beside the simple recollection of the man, how trivial all the tributes seem! After the brief rehearsal of what words can utter, comes that which is unutterable—the long separation, the long remembrance, the long, long pain. But it is Nature's kind provision that "Hope springs eternal in the human breast."

A PUBLIC MEETING was held at the Faine Memorial building last Sunday forenoon, as a farewell testimony to the character and services of Ralph H. Ranney. There was a full audience, which manifested the deepest sympathy with the occasion. Mr. Seaver presided, and addresses were made by Messrs. Varity, King, Davies, Stevens, Bradford, Abbot, Burke, Seaver, and Mendum. The following resolutions were read and silently adopted by the meeting:—

WHEREAS, We have met in Investigator Hall to pay our parting tribute of respect and friendship for the life and memory of a most worthy and lamented friend and associate, and to sympathize with his afflicted family and relatives in their sudden and painful bereavement: therefore

Resolved, That, while we deplore the loss of one whose social qualities, whose kindness of heart, whose high sense of honor, and whose love of truth made him a dear and valued personal friend, we also recognize the fact that his love of justice, his hatred of wrong and oppression, rendering him ever active and self-sacrificing in what he believed to be right, entitle him to be regarded as a devoted friend of humanity.

Resolved, That we sincerely and affectionately sympathize with the bereaved relatives of the deceased, and cherish the hope that the tender regard in which his many virtues and his memory are held by his friends may tend to soften the effect of the blow by which they have been so painfully afflicted.

Resolved, That in the death of R. H. Ranney, we mourn the loss of one whose rare intellectual endowments and great moral worth entitle him to the full measure of esteem in which he was held by all who knew him.

Resolved, That his able, faithful, and persevering efforts as a defender of religious liberty, universal mental freedom, and equal rights for all, were worthy of the highest commendation, and proved the inherent nobility of a mind controlled and governed by genuine liberal principles.

Resolved, That a copy of these Resolutions be transmitted to the family of our deceased friend and associate, and published in the Investigator, THE INDEX, and the New Age.

RALPH H. RANNEY.

A week ago, the mortal remains of one of the best men of this generation were laid tenderly and with tears in their last resting-place. The respect and regret of all who knew him in any degree, and the reverence, love, and profound grief of all who knew him well, are his living monument to-day, and testify how deep an impress his gentle, unassuming, and exquisitely beautiful character has left behind it. His bereaved family and relatives have at least the consolation of a universal and spontaneous tribute to his worth such as is seldom accorded to one so young.

If Mr. Ranney had been merely a private citizen, there would be an impropriety in public manifestations on this sad occasion. But he was more than that. Never did any one devote himself more unselfishly to a public cause, or labor for it more efficiently and usefully, or give more brilliant promise of signal service to it in the future. The advancement of all that was true and liberal in thought, all that was beneficent in action, all that was just and equal and pure in public affairs, was to him a supreme object, enlisting a stronger interest and effort on his part than anything that concerned himself alone. Especially did he take up the cause of State Secularization with rare unselfishness and devotion, not because he enjoyed it (for he far more enjoyed the world of speculative thought and inquiry), but because he comprehended and felt the profound importance of this cause, recognized the high duty it imposes, and resolved in his unpretending and conscientious way to discharge this duty to the uttermost. Unavoidably conspicuous as he was becoming in this field of action, probably no one but myself knew how completely and entirely he was impelled to such exertions by a naked sense of duty. His tastes were all in another direction; but the remarkable clearness of his intellect and the grand strength of his moral nature made him faithful to obligations unfelt or unregarded by so many others. There is at least one left behind him who knew what a hero he was in secret, and who to the last hour of life will pay him such reverence as the hero alone commands.

Ralph H. Ranney was born in Ashfield, a little country town in Western Massachusetts, on the sixteenth of March, 1845. From 1848 to 1849, he lived with his parents in Boston. His mother died while he was still a child; his father, Mr. Henry S. Ranney, now left childless, is one of the most respected citizens of Ashfield. Ralph enjoyed such educational advantages as were afforded by the public school and academy of his native town, together with several months of instruction at Eastman's Business College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where he probably acquired his unusually delicate and beautiful handwriting. He enlisted as a private in Company F of the 34th Regiment, Massachusetts Infantry, on July 11, 1862, at the age of seventeen. His father endeavored to dissuade him from this step on account of his rather frail health and immaturity; but, though possessing little of the spirit of mere adventure, he persisted, "arguing that it was a service to be done by some one, and his life being worth no more than others, he could not conscientiously leave it for others to do the duty that belonged to him." In those words of quiet heroism, how the spirit of the boy foreshadowed the spirit of the man I knew! He served with honor till the end of the war, being engaged in the following actions: Ripon, Va., October 18, 1863; New Market, May 15, 1864; Piedmont, June 5, 1864; Lynchburg, June 18, 1864; Opequan, September 19, 1864; Fisher's Hill, September 22, 1864; Stickney's Farm, October 13, 1864; Hatcher's Run, March 31 and April 1, 1865; Fort Gregg, April 2, 1865. He was twice wounded, being shot through the arm and again through the hand, on June 18 and October 13, 1864; and at the time of his death he was on the Pension Rolls for disability incurred in the service. He was present at Appomattox Court House when General Lee surrendered to General Grant, and picked up and brought home a bit of the apple-tree under which that famous surrender was made. But so modest was he that only now and then, in later years, did he make a casual allusion to his long and honorable service in the army; these facts, indeed, I have learned chiefly from his sorrowing but justly proud father since his death. From "Near Woodstock, Va., May 27, 1864," he wrote to a beloved sister, whose early death ten years later he deeply mourned: "Life is sweet to all, but not too good to yield in such a cause." Sweet as life was to his sunny and serene nature, it was all spent in the cause of humanity, from the day when he took up arms in defence of political liberty to the day when, in defence of the still more sacred liberty of the soul,—

"He, the young and strong, who cherished
Noble longings for the strife,
By the wayside fell and perished,
Weary with the march of life."

On the conclusion of the war Mr. Ranney went into business. For several years past he has been in the service of a respectable business firm in Boston, by whom he was held in the highest esteem for fidelity and integrity. In 1867, he was most happily married to a lady in every way worthy of him; and he was devotedly fond of his home, with his two little children, a girl and boy. Although a most faithful and efficient business man, his whole heart was in something larger and higher than money-making; and he was singularly independent and fearless as to incurring odium by his pronounced, uncompromising radicalism. No trimmer, no time-server, no skulker behind bushes, was Ralph H. Ranney. He never shrank from any necessary publicity, though there never was a man who coveted or sought it less; he was ready to run all risks on behalf of truth and freedom. But there was not a tinge of egotism or conceit in his character—not a particle of that pretentious self-consciousness which mars the work of so many real reformers. Everywhere and always, he was the same cheerful, modest, intelligent, intrepid, keen, and transparently sincere thinker; he won the hearts even of his opponents in debate; and the utter kindness of his spirit made even the boldest of his statements inoffensive to those who might otherwise have been "shocked." Some of the sincerest mourners for him now are persons of unquestioned Orthodoxy. His genial presence and winning personality disarmed all prejudice, and made him what it would be fatal praise to affirm of almost any other—a man without an enemy.

About the middle of last month he was attacked with pleurisy, suffering great pain. In order to secure for him the best possible treatment, he was removed to the Boston City Hospital on October 29. The removal was effected safely, and Mr. Ranney cheerfully expressed satisfaction with his surroundings and attendance there; but about eleven o'clock the same evening he suddenly threw up his hands, and expired. It is doubtful whether he knew his own danger; but it is certain that he was tranquil in mind to the last.

Five or six years ago, Mr. Ranney took a very active part in establishing a new freethought society in Ashfield, which flourished so long as he remained a resident of that place. Very early he became interested in THE INDEX, and also in the Free Religious Association. In June, 1873, he was elected a Director of the Index Association, and in November of the same year its Treasurer; and he discharged all his duties with more than fidelity, giving unsparingly his time, energy, and labor to make it successful in its great work. From the beginning he took the deepest interest in the Liberal League movement, was one of the most active in starting the Boston Liberal League, and, as member of its Executive Committee, did the work of twenty, in the winter of 1873—1874, in bringing before the Massachusetts Legislature the subject of church taxation. It is safe to say that the powerful agitation of that winter, of which the final results have not yet been reached, but which has accomplished far more already than is apparent on the surface of things, would have been impossible without Mr. Ranney's indefatigable exertions. There seemed to be no limit to his self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of public justice in matters of religion. The Centennial Congress of Liberals, and the National Liberal League which it organized, commanded his profoundest interest at the time; and, having reluctantly consented to accept the prominent position of Secretary to the new League, he carried into its work all the energy and efficiency of his character. No one else, perhaps, can fully appreciate the loss which the National Liberal League suffers by his untimely death, for no one else was fully aware of the extent, power, and value of his services. There was in him a marvellous sagacity, fertility of resources, vigor of will, energy in execution, and withal scrupulousness and honorableness in the use of means, which rendered him one of the most admirable of executive officers, and could not have failed to render him a man of marked and extraordinary usefulness in the great work of the future. Alas, who can tell the story of his worth, or unfold the greatness of the loss which his death inflicts on the cause he loved with such surpassing faithfulness? That task requires an abler pen than mine. I can but put on record here, as a tribute due to one of the sweetest spirits and noblest characters and ablest tollers I have ever known in this great cause, my sense of incalculable indebtedness to Ralph H. Ranney for all that he was and did.

RELIGIOUS POLITICS.

It is objected by interested readers of THE INDEX and by friends of its editor that it is too much devoted to politics, and is losing sight of the grand aims of free religion in the consideration of secondary objects. If the charge were wholly true; if THE INDEX lent itself to the discussion of local or incidental issues in politics to the neglect of fundamental principles; or if, in discussing fundamental principles, it gave prominence to the political rather than to the human aspect of questions, the objection would be grave. We have never held it proper or justifiable for religious teachers, whether through the press or from the pulpit, to become partisans or to advocate party measures before the mixed companies of readers or hearers who have a right to expect other things, and who desire to forget rather than to remember the difference of opinion that divides them. Religious teachers are concerned with religious ideas, and with those only. When such ideas are clearly involved in political issues, as was the case to a large extent with anti-slavery politics in the last generation, it is no more their right than their duty to indicate the bearing of the principle, always keeping its demands uppermost. Such cases arise but seldom, and when they do arise require delicate treatment. The absolute separation of Church and State is a principle that cannot be too rigidly insisted on in view of the enormous mischiefs entailed on mankind by their union in past times. But the separation of Church and State as two distinct organized dominions is a very different thing from the divorce of religion from politics. Against such a divorce we earnestly protest as deeply injurious to both politics and religion. Politics and religion need one another. Politics need religion to save them from becoming petty, mean, partisan, inhuman. Religion needs politics to save it from becoming visionary, speculative, and useless. With us the religious issue in politics is more sharply drawn than anywhere else.

We live in a republic, the successful working whereof depends on the absolute non-interference of instituted religion with the movements of the popular mind and will. That sectarianism, dogmatism, ecclesiasticism, denominationalism should be kept out of politics is of prime importance. Neither Romanism nor Protestantism, neither Christianity nor Buddhism, neither theism, atheism, nor pantheism, as such, has any claim to influence over political affairs. For, there being no established Church, no publicly or formally ratified faith, it is sheer impertinence for any faith to impose its restrictions on the minds of the people. Any assumption of that kind must be resisted vehemently, and to the last gasp.

It is not discerned, we submit, with perfect clearness, save by the few, that such an assumption follows necessarily from the claim of any religion to be divinely revealed. A divinely revealed religion must, in the nature of the case, be supreme over merely human laws and regulations. The hierarchy which God has himself ordained claims temporal powers as a matter of course. The nurture of children, the education of youth, the marriage of adults, the enactments for the order and peace of society, the restraint of violence, the punishment of crime, come strictly within its province. Being providentially appointed for the administration of human affairs, it cannot decline to undertake it, cannot be patient under attempts to take such administration out of its control. The Book that is "the Word of God," if there be such a book, ought to be read in families, in schools, in hotels, in saloons, and cabins of steam-boats; in short, wherever reading is done; all other literature ought to be judged by it, and remanded to an inferior place. The champions of the Bible in the schools are consistent with their fundamental principle, and more than consistent with it; their extreme demand is justified by their first assumption. It may be very true that a large majority of the professed believers in the divine revelation do not feel the force of the assumption, yield their ground under the pressure of superficial arguments, consult policy, good feeling, convenience, easy-going compliance, and slide into positions quite irreconcilable with their avowed faith. This only proves their infidelity. The leaders, more wary, less under the influence of social feeling, clearer of perception, and more resolute of will, cling to their purpose and see in the facile compliance of their constituencies with popular secularism a preparation for the exercise of their own diplomatic arts when the time to employ them shall have arrived. Their best material will be furnished by these soft-headed, soft-hearted multitudes, who never go to the bottom of their own minds, never understand the requirements of their own systems, but are pliable to the strongest touch of any party. It certainly does look on the surface as if our national politics had little to fear from ecclesiastical or sectarian intervention. Yet they may have everything to fear; this apparent harmlessness may be one symptom of a subtle danger lying deeper than the eye perceives. So long as the claim of Christianity to be the one divinely revealed and providentially instituted religion is maintained; so long as it is maintained in good faith by any considerable number of influential people (as certainly we are compelled to believe or else to set down as insincere and hypocritical the professions of a large number of most estimable and honorable men), so long the danger of political intrigue and interference will exist. Hence the attitude so much criticised of THE INDEX. Hence the position taken by free religion, which asserts the equal rights of all religions and demands the unconditional surrender of Christianity as well as of Judaism or Mohammedanism to the genius of humanity. Until that surrender is made it will be the duty of free religion and of THE INDEX, as one of its organs, to meet the adversary on his own ground; if that ground is political, to follow him there, and make use of all its advantage by appealing to patriotism, public spirit, the popular sensitiveness against tyranny, the popular passion for liberty. If more perceived the essential incongruity between a revealed religion and republican institutions, the conflict would be more quietly fought and sooner ended.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY R. C.

Inasmuch as the result of the Presidential contest will be known to our readers before this paragraph can be read by them, it is hardly worth while to indulge in speculations with regard to it. As we write, both parties appear to be equally confident of success, and as both give equally good reasons for their confidence, it is probable that the electoral vote will be pretty evenly divided between them. We see no reason, therefore, for modifying the calculation of probabilities given a few weeks ago. Whatever be the ultimate result of the election, however, we may safely predict that it will be neither quite so good nor altogether so bad as some persons may hope upon the one hand or dread upon the other. We fully believe that the next administration—whether that of Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden—will be an improvement upon the present. We do not believe it will succeed in establishing absolute peace at the South, nor that it will create a new rebellion there. We do not believe it will permanently establish a system of civil-service reform, but shall be satisfied if it avoid the grave mistakes of Grant's administration, and initiate measures of reform to be perfected by its successors. We do not believe that without the cordial support of the thoughtful and honest men of both parties—including their decided critics, when necessary—it will be able to preserve the honor of the country during its progress toward the resumption of specie payments. The next President is likely to have opportunities for achieving an unusually brilliant reputation, or for doing a great deal of mischief. Party difficulties, however, whoever may be elected, will probably prevent the former, and we are willing to trust either Tilden or Hayes to confront the latter.

We dislike exceedingly to find fault with or to differ from a man so universally respected as the poet Whittier; but when he chooses to write a political letter he must expect to be judged as a politician and not as a poet. He sent, last week, a letter to the Boston Journal, advocating the election of ex-Governor Claflin as Congressman from Massachusetts. The letter is very eulogistic, and affirms that Claflin possesses all the qualifications necessary to-day in a member of Congress. Now, as matter of fact, Mr. Claflin, about six months ago, gave an elaborate statement of his views upon financial questions. Some of these were such as would do discredit to the merest tyro in finance, and showed unmistakably that Mr. Claflin had no adequate knowledge of his subject. When nominated for Congress recently, however, he hastened to write a letter expressing agreement with the Cincinnati Platform on this subject, and favoring resumption at or before the date already fixed by Congress. Without doubt the financial question is the most important question, as regards national honor and commercial prosperity, with which the next Congress will deal, and men who can flap about on this question with the ease of Governor Claflin are the most unsafe men possible to be sent to Congress at the present time. Nearly all that Whittier says in his praise may be correct, but may nevertheless have very little to do with his possible excellence as a Congressman. We have gone far beyond the days when philanthropic zeal and honesty of purpose made a good politician. Intellectual clearness is now a primary requisite, and that, with reference to one most important subject, at least, Mr. Claflin has not got.

The several communications upon the negro question, in the last number of THE INDEX, are interesting from more than one point of view; but we hardly feel called upon to offer any extended comment upon them. The article of "W. J. P." does not, in our opinion, render necessary any modification of statements upon the subject in preceding numbers. The principal portion of the article is written upon the theory that we "do not believe in negro suffrage, or at least think it has proved a failure in the South." As this supposition is entirely incorrect, "W. J. P." so far as we are concerned, has been arguing against a man of straw. The ballot was given to the negro as a weapon of defence, and as such was successfully employed. The negro now needs instruction in its use as an instrument of civilization, and this instruction (bad enough, at times, as it is likely to be) we believe can be given better by the men with whom he is to be associated for generations to come than by Northern adventurers who make use of him for their own gain. The wisdom of the original measures of reconstruction and the question of unqualified suffrage are not now under discussion. We are content to argue from existing facts alone. We observe that "W. J. P." in his last paragraph, supposes the existence of persons whose humane feeling for the negro "first and chiefly expresses itself" by calling him a lot of hard names, "and then handing him over as an incorrigible barbarian to the keeping of his old master." We have never met with any one coming under this description, but trust that if "W. J. P." finds one he will go after him at once with a sharp stick, for we are sure he must be an unmitigated rogue deserving of all the chastisement that "W. J. P." may choose to give him.

In connection with this South Carolina question, we feel compelled to refer to a passage in a communication from W. E. Lukens, in the last INDEX, in which we are referred to as "one whose predilections are on the side of the oppressor." We can assure the writer that he is thoroughly in error in his supposition. We are not acquainted with him, but we are perfectly willing to match our record against his as "an humble soldier in that long moral conflict," etc. Mr. Lukens should learn that the "moral conflict" referred to came to an end some time ago, and that the negro question to-day is one of expediency strictly; one, moreover, with reference to which men of equally excellent philanthropic impulses may honestly and diametrically differ. As matter of fact, the Southern negro is to-day enjoying the greatest proportion of the advantages resulting from "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in those States in which he is either ruled by or is sharing the government with the white man, and not in those States in which he is now or has been recently in full control. Nearly all reports of outrage and murder come from States in which the negro is ruler. The welfare of the negro, as well as of the white, is at the bottom of our desire for the election of Wade Hampton. We believe that this would soonest teach the negro the lesson which he must learn at last,—that coöperation with the white man is better for both races than a continuance of the present disastrous warfare between them.

Baptist ministers are a funny people. At their regular meeting in Boston, last week, they discussed the question, "Do the Scriptures teach that there will be two resurrections, distinct in time; the first of the righteous, and the second of the wicked?" Upon this important question it appears that a decided division of opinion exists; a majority of the Baptist ministers of this country believing in one resurrection, while a majority of those of England, including Mr. Spurgeon, believe in two resurrections. Now, according to Baptist logic, the Scriptures are intended for the guidance of unlearned men, and this resurrection question, therefore, must be plainly decided by Scripture passages. Difference of opinion can hardly be explained except by reference to the perversity and consequent sinfulness of men. One-half of the whole number of Baptist ministers are therefore unconverted sinners, who certainly should not be allowed to preach. Will some Baptist paper please tell us whether this reasoning be correct or not?

The Committee of the Congregational Association of New York and Brooklyn, appointed last April to coöperate in bringing evidence before the Commission provided for by the Advisory Council called by Plymouth Church, reported, last week, that "after more than six months' opportunity to speak, and after the most urgent and public entreaty that every one would speak who had anything to say against Mr. Beecher, no one had seen fit to respond"—all of which, we may add, is precisely the result anticipated and predicted when the Commission was appointed. But every one we are sure did not anticipate the action of the Congregational Association upon receiving the above report, which was to adopt unanimously a resolution declaring that "WHEREAS, The preceding report indicates that there is no substantial ground for believing in the guilt of Mr. Beecher, therefore be it Resolved, That we do as an association regard our brother as worthy of our confidence and love, and express to him our sympathy in the severe trial through which he has passed." The suit of Moulton against Beecher has just been postponed for twenty days to allow Mr. Beecher to file an answer to Moulton's amended complaint.

The Spiritualists are having a hard time. In London Dr. Slade has been sentenced to the work-house as a vagrant, after a trial of unusual interest, during which his most important tricks were performed in open court by Mr. Maskelyne, a noted juggler. In Boston, the Herald has actually driven from the city a Mrs. Bennett, who was becoming known as a most wonderful "materializer," and whose deceptions were fully exposed by that paper. It has followed up its defeat of Mrs. Bennett by a very damaging attack upon a Mrs. Hardy, another worker in "materializations," who has been visited and approved by many well-known men,—Gerald Massey and others. And last Saturday evening a Mr. Bishop gave a lecture in Music Hall, during which he performed successfully (although watched by Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Rev. Rufus Ellis, and Professor Horsford) all the cabinet, rope-tying, and other feats of professed mediums, and subsequently repeated and explained the most important of them in full view of the audience.

Eastern difficulties are no nearer a solution apparently than when we last referred to them. Pending the troublesome negotiations for an armistice, Turkey renewed her attacks upon the Servian army and fortifications, with such good success that at the end of a few days' fighting it was evident that no Servian army or fortification could possibly prevent the entire subjugation of the country. At this stage, however, Russia suddenly renewed her demand that Turkey consent to a six weeks' armistice, adding the threat that unless consent be given in forty-eight hours diplomatic relations between Turkey and Russia should cease. As this meant immediate war, Turkey decided to accept; and the various powers, with the exception of Germany, have appointed commissions to decide upon the positions to be occupied by the contending forces during the armistice. As we write, however, a report is published stating that the Russian commission requires all the Turkish forces in Servia to retire to the frontier during the armistice. If this be true, it is not at all probable that Turkey can assent to the requirement, and a declaration of war between Turkey and Russia will follow. Indeed, some reports are to the effect that Russia has at last determined upon war at all hazards.

"THE FAMILY BANK:

"ITS RELATIONS TO THE LABOR QUESTION."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In your issue of Sept. 7th was an article, under the above title, which involves so deeply and disastrously the welfare of working people that I am moved to ask of you brief space to reply. The writer said:—

"The wages people are now asking for legislation in a communistic direction; in effect, that the general court should take capital to some extent out of the control of individuals and corporations for their special benefit. . . . The laborers are too much taxed as it is. They are mostly men and women with hopes, and cannot afford to have any infringement of individual liberty or of the rights of property. It is for their interest to cultivate and encourage rather than pillage the rich."

This writer (whom I take to be Hon. Elizur Wright) is mistaken in supposing that, in a compulsory legislative sense, the tendency of labor reformers is "communistic"; that we are disposed to "pillage the rich," or in any other way to invade "the rights of property." While I grant that there is some ground for his assertion, if he had in view eight and ten-hour law schemes, graduated taxation, government-workshopism, and the greenback delusion, still, those merely transient phases of the agitation should not blind a clear-seeing writer to the main demand of labor reform,—opportunity and reciprocity. Mr. Wright has but to turn the pages of P. J. Proudhon, John Ruskin, Josiah Warren, William B. Greene, J. K. Ingalls, or other intelligent exponents of labor-reform thought, to find the interference policy, "communism" as he understands it, utterly rejected; and that all we ask of government is not to obstruct the path of productive enterprise; that, in Daniel Webster's phrase, it will "protect persons and property from invasion."

But, in order to effectually "protect persons and property from invasion," government must apply the free-trade idea to banks and landlords as well as to custom houses; it must not only cease to sanction tariff frauds, but also usury, rent, property in land, compulsive taxation, majority rule, and every other means of speculative increase or intrusive dictation. Since no political economist pretends to deny that labor is the source of wealth and the only true basis of exchange; and since, as John Stuart Mill says, "The essential principle on which private property is based is to assure to all persons what they have produced by their labor," those only who oppose speculative increase in all forms truly defend "the rights of property." I am surprised that Elizur Wright, a bright-minded Abolitionist, can suppose that the old communistic dogma, "what the law makes property is property," is any more defensible when applied to speculative profits than when it was used by Henry Clay to defend negro slavery. Closer study of the labor question will disclose to him the fact that, in the field of essential equity, labor reformers are almost alone in asserting "the rights of property"; that is, the right of labor to its earnings.

Mr. Wright has written much to show that the old life insurance system has outlived its usefulness; but he fails to see that, while his "family bank" discards some abuses, it is an effort to popularize and perpetuate the worst feature of the old system, the greatest extant fraud on labor usury. He says in his "Circular," a portion of which you reprinted, it is to be "the bank of the laborers," "a savings bank with a life insurance function." How presuming it is to call this "the laborer's bank" may be seen in the fact that Proudhon's "Bank of Exchange," Greene's "Mutual Bank," Warren's "Time Bank," all the banks ever proposed by clear-headed labor reformers, discard usury, were suggested by the belief that interest on money is robbery, and that any "laborer" who takes usury thereby helps his worst enemy to invade and destroy his own class. Mr. Wright cannot be aware of how grave an imposition his "bank," as a bank, is on working people. He proposes to give capital systematic and perpetual power to plunder its own well-beloved parent, labor.

But, not to mention the incidental "aid and comfort" which his bank gives to the "specie-basis" fraud and the compulsory-marriage feud, its "life insurance function" is the chief cat hidden in this financial, "family" meal. The old life insurance system largely rests on a bet, a wager-laying, gambling process in which those who "put up" the most money win the fewest and smallest prizes. To make money out of life insurance you must die early and die often. But of those not lucky enough to die, the number of working people and business men who, by stress of "hard times," have been compelled to surrender their policies, is fearful to contemplate! Companies have become enormously rich out of this one extortionate source of income. Notwithstanding the many merits of the system, and the opinions of many worthy people who still believe in it, its tendency to draw capital from productive enterprise and concentrate it in cities for speculative purposes, to create many offices and officials to be supported by "the insured," and its disastrous relations to holders of "foreclosed" policies, indicate that it has had its day, and must soon disappear. While I have no desire to underrate the merits of Mr. Wright's scheme (and his many years' experience in life insurance renders him peculiarly capable of suggesting improvements), it seems to me that what he himself, in his admirable book, Politics and Mysteries of Life Insurance, terms "perfection in theory," where "the risk of each year, no more and no less, is paid for at the beginning, in the course of, or at the end of the year," "a thousand persons agreeing to pay one dollar each to the family of each deceased member," is destined to prove itself, if not "perfection" in practice, vastly superior to the betting, usury method of the old system, or of the "family bank." Accumulating facts tend to show that this cooperative method immensely reduces the cost of insurance, leaves capital where it ought to be left, in productive business, and is abundantly self-supporting and self-perpetuating.

WHY I CAST A PROTEST-BALLOT.

PASSAIC, N. J., Oct. 27, 1876,

EDITOR INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—A correspondent of your paper from Utica has explained why he is a Democrat; another from Dover explains why he will vote the Republican ticket; may I state briefly why I shall cast a protest-ballot this autumn?

It is a fact that at least a majority of the intelligent men are Republican voters, and the intelligent women would be if they could vote. It is equally true that from among the Republican ranks have come most of those who are earnest for liberty, without regard to race or color. But the party as a party has by reason of success and power become corrupt; and seeks retention in power, not to reform, but for the love of power.

A change is needed, as is evident now, and was when Greeley was nominated; for the party will not reform itself, and leaves but one course open to those who feel the necessity for a change. My fellow INDEX subscriber from Utica sees the possibility of the desired change in Democratic success, and argues well; but he forgets that the large mass of the Democrats are wedded to party, and were he to urge any liberal views, he would be read out of the party very quickly. And our friend from Dover surely has much faith in his party, to feel so confident that, as a party, it will aid him in liberal movements.

The need of the hour is secularization; and while the Democrats may seem to be on our side, they cannot be depended on as party men. Neither can we depend on the Republicans. I have before me a pamphlet—"Politics and the School Question"—issued by the Republicans from their New York city headquarters, which should be a positive cure for any INDEX liberal who was afflicted with a desire to vote that ticket this autumn. It presents the views of public men regarding the value and necessity of our public schools, and quotes words which read and sound well. Grant, Blaine, Noyes, R. B. Hayes, and several State Conventions are quoted from, as advocating "non-sectarian" schools. And the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the State of New York is quoted as opposed to giving aid to any school where "instruction is given peculiar to any church, creed, sect, denomination, or religious society"; and the platform of New Jersey Republican Convention is quoted, as opposed to any attempts to impair our schools, and demanding an amendment to keep the schools free "from all ecclesiastical or sectarian interference."

All this reads finely, and I might imagine our good friend "C. H. H." quite pleased with the pamphlet; but let us read other parts of it.

The Republican National Convention is quoted as favoring an amendment "forbidding the application of any public fund or property for the benefit of any school or institution under sectarian control. Hayes and Wheeler are quoted as favoring a similar amendment, each using the expression "against all danger of sectarian control" in urging an amendment to that end.

And now we are told of Mr. Blaine's amendment, amended by the Senate Committee (assisted by the Christian Amendment people); in which Senate amendment is to be found this little sentence: "This article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution, and it shall not have the effect to impair the rights of property already vested." So at last the secret is out; "non-sectarian schools" means schools where evangelical teachers can read Protestant Bibles, selecting any part they prefer; and to this is added in many places the singing of evangelical hymns.

Quite harmless, many would say; and yet I am mistaken if "C. H. H." will feel so on second thought. This question of an entire separation of Church and State must be met, and met squarely; I for one prefer to meet it now. While ready to show respect for any earnest person, whether evangelical or not, I must insist on all schools and public places being free from anything "sectarian" or "peculiar to any church, creed, or denomination." If the Bible and religious hymns of the evangelical type are not sectarian or peculiar to a church and a creed, as these terms are generally used, then I am sadly at fault. From out of this slough of double-meaning terms, and words and resolutions intended to be liberal to liberals and evangelical to evangelicals, there is but one safe way: secularization of the State, and that immediately.

Therefore, though not forgetting the need of reform, which the Democrats promise, and the danger of injustice to the colored people which the Republicans say that they alone can avert, I must confess that I feel the need of secularization more than either; for only the lack of power prevents our evangelical friends and our Catholic friends from putting an end to all hope of a free secular country.

Therefore I will not vote either for Tilden or for Hayes, but cast this my protest-ballot (a printed copy of which I send to you) as follows:—

"Under existing laws a citizen must either vote for electors named by some large political party, or virtually lose his right to assist in selecting a President. Such being the case, and as the only way possible, I cast this as a protest-ballot to express my distrust of the Republican and Democratic parties on the question of the secularization of the State. And I would also express the hope that all citizens may be treated as equal before the law, without questioning their religious beliefs, and this nation become wholly secular, and thereby saved from the curse of a State religion, whether Christianity or any other."

To those who would say, "Why throw away your vote?" "Why not choose the lesser of two evils?" "Why fly in the face of the majority?" I borrow a sentence from our religious friends, and say: "One with God is a majority."

Yours truly,

F. A. ANGELL.

THE GREATER DANGER.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—I find in Mr. Frederic's letter in THE INDEX of Oct. 12 an opinion which I have myself expressed in private conversation,—that our religious liberties are not in so great, at least so immediate, danger from Catholics as from Protestants; and that the Democratic party is more to be trusted on this question than the Republican. It has always been the policy of the Roman Church to demand all it thinks there is any chance of getting, but to acquiesce quietly when its demands are refused. I think it will be so with regard to the public schools. Archbishop Purcell's letter is already an indication of this. But the Religious Amendment is an immediate danger; one which Catholics must oppose in self-defence, and which Democrats must oppose as being at variance with the very fundamental principles of their party. I have not myself so much fear of the Catholics as many; partly, I suppose, because I am daily associated with Catholics in work of a partly public nature, and have daily opportunities of witnessing wholly public functions performed faithfully and ably by Catholics. Our late Chief-Justice Taney, a man of unimpeachable integrity and public spirit, was a Catholic; so were many of our generals in the late war. By all means keep power from the priestly class,—of all denominations; but Catholic laymen I would as soon trust as any others.

There is one indictment of the Republican party of which enough has not been made in this canvass,—that is, its utter faithlessness to the fundamental principles of constitutional liberty. I do not mean merely the dangerous habit of settling everything by authority, which grew out of the exigencies of the war, nor the centralizing spirit which has threatened wholly to subvert the rights of our States. The student of English constitutional history is startled to observe how coolly the Republican majority has been engaged in Congress, in Louisiana, in South Carolina, in trampling down those safeguards of liberty which our ancestors for generations were vindicating against the royal power. Just now the Republican party is the party of prerogative; the Democratic party represents constitutional liberty.

Again, there is a marked contrast in regard to the influence exercised by the two candidates upon the canvass. Mr. Tilden's hand has been constantly seen as a power, and a healthy one, in the action of his party. On the other hand, Mr. Hayes has been absolutely silent, while men like Chandler, Blaine, and Butler have turned the canvass into one of false issues and personalities; nay, he invites Mr. Blaine to conduct the canvass in the West. If he has the power to fight corruption and partisanship in the White House, why does he not exert it now, and give us an honorable campaign on the part of his party? The Republican party had two opportunities: first, to nominate Bristow; second, to take Hayes' letter as the key-note of the campaign. Both opportunities they have thrown away.

INTUITION AGAIN.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

I have just read with great interest Mr. Wickersham's "Thoughts on Intuition," in THE INDEX of Oct. 12. I am especially pleased with his ideas, because in the main they so well accord with thoughts that came to me spontaneously several years since, as to the true interpretation of what is usually understood by the term intuition.

Much is involved in the decision of the question whether ideas come into the mind by a divine influx, amounting to what is understood as infallible inspiration, which the soul can rely upon as sure and unquestionable, concerning its most vital interests—ideas of God and immortality,—or whether the conclusions arrived at are merely the result of rapid, unremembered processes of thought, founded upon the data of preconceived ideas early implanted and accepted without evidence. In the one case, one's hopes and principles are founded upon an Eternal Rock; in the other they are utterly baseless.

On the supposition that what intuitionists regard as ideas and truths coming into the mind without effort, and as being "above and beyond reason, and standing on an authority of their own, above the province of reason to criticize," there should be an entire agreement in these ideas and truths thus received by different minds, the source being the same. And yet how diverse and contradictory the results! And who has the right to assume that his own "intuitions" are the infallible ones, and that to them must be accorded the supremacy over all others? It would seem that intuitionists, in putting forth their claims, have overlooked the difficulty of solving this problem, and are chargeable with a little obtuseness and a little arrogance in the matter.

The practical bearing of the decision of this question is great. A multitude of superstitions and fancies in religion and in morals would be swept away, if the only conclusions arrived at were drawn from sound, logical processes of reasoning, deduced from well-established premises.

Mr. Wickersham's supposition as to the origin of conscience seems perfectly reasonable, and pleasingly in harmony with the grand doctrine of evolution. The supposed process by which the idea first dawned upon the mind seems entirely natural. It shows the elements of what is called conscience, as well as of all that is comprehended under the term morals, to inhere in the nature of things, and that its laws do not receive their force from any arbitrary command, but are a part of Nature itself, and are as inexorable as any of its laws in the material world. Great strength and happiness come from this view of the subject, and also an increased sense of obligation to search earnestly in the direction of a scientific basis of morals, which, in its comprehensive sense, must include also the whole of religion. A. H.

ANOTHER KIND OF "INTUITION."

TIPPECANOE CITY, Ohio, Oct. 21, 1876.

I should like to say to Mr. Wickersham that I was highly entertained and instructed by his article in THE INDEX on "Intuition." But I have come across in my experience through life another class of facts which should, perhaps, be classed as intuitions, and which, as I think, cannot be explained as Mr. Wickersham explained his "mathematical intuitions." They occur in every-day life. I will give one case as a sample of what I refer to, and ask an explanation.

My father was serving in the war of 1812. We had not the least expectation of his return, when one night about eight o'clock a brother (older than I) sat looking into the fire. Suddenly he said: "Father is coming home." A short time later he said: "Father is at such a place" (naming the place). Later still he said: "Father is at another place" (again naming the place). Again a short time elapsed, and he said: "Father is at the door." And that very instant father opened the door and came in!

A single case of this kind might perhaps be explained by the law of incidents; but such facts have, I think, in my experience, occurred too often to be so explained. We all know that the lives of many are full of them. In my own mind I have no doubt but in all such cases there is a natural something connecting the mind and thought; but what is that something? Please explain it who can! It may here be proper to say father did come home through the places named by my brother; they were in a by-path, after father had left the main road.

E. L. CRANE.

THE CALL FOR ACTION.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Inasmuch as THE INDEX is the sentinel on the watch-tower of liberty, it must carefully overlook the whole field, and see that the guards faithfully perform their duties. No one must be allowed to pass without giving the watch-word. Foes are lurking in ambush, and it behooves the friends of freedom to see that no Judas Iscariot is placed upon duty.

In your issue of the 12th, you challenged the Republican Presidential candidate for the countersign. It was a timely step, well taken, and in the sacred name of liberty it should be given before he is allowed to enter the fort. Grave charges of being implicated with the American Alliance movement have been made against him, which, if true, is a matter of great moment, and should receive the serious consideration of every liberty-loving man in the Union. If he indited the following, he is unworthy of our confidence and support:—

"COLUMBUS, Ohio, June 29, 1876.

"Dear Sir,—Your favor of the 19th inst. received, with certificate of membership, constitution, etc., of the American Alliance. Be pleased to accept my thanks for your high appreciation of myself.

"Trusting that I may prove worthy of the confidence reposed in me, I remain your fellow-citizen.

"R. B. HAYES."

If he wrote, or authorized the writing of the letter attributed to him, he is a dangerous man, and no liberalist should aid in placing him in power. If the charge is unjust, he has only to deny it, and it will be cast aside as partisan persecution.

These are perilous times, and we must look well to the interest of our free institutions. The heaven-born principles of Garrisonian Republicanism are fast passing from power. Justice weeps in our Capitol, while corruption rules the land. The sceptre of liberty "will pass from India," if we put not forth a hand to save.

Our trusty sentinel, the liberty-loving INDEX, has long sounded the alarm-bell. We have heard the tocsin ringing, ringing in our ears; but, like one half asleep, we have scarcely opened our eyes to the sound, whilst all this time the enemy have been throwing up breast-works, strengthening and fortifying for an attack. And what are the liberalists doing in way of defence? Are we preparing to meet the attempt that will be made to overthrow our religious liberties? The struggle will as surely come as cometh the hoar-frost to nip the verdure of spring. We should arouse from our slumbers, gird on our armor, and with united force meet the hosts of bigotry and superstition in battle array.

The liberalists must go to work earnestly, and systematically, if they wish to maintain their rights. In every city, hamlet, and town, they must unfurl their banners. They must hold meetings, form clubs, circulate documents, employ speakers; in short, they must organize at once, and, full of life and vigor, meet the enemy half way.

Yours for liberty and justice,

S. M. CARROLL.

RADICAL DEMOCRACY!

[We publish the following "Address to the Citizens of the United States, with special reference to the citizens of Wisconsin," in cheerful compliance with the wish of the Committee.—ED.]

The experience of a century has sufficiently made known to every intelligent United States citizen who is able to judge impartially and honestly, that the principal evil, the root of all our political and social ills, is based upon the way in which the executive power of the Republic is regulated by the Constitution. The party system, with its struggle for life and death in behalf of a few persons, and to the damage of the people; corruption and covetousness which extend through all classes of office-holders and representatives of the people, yes, even through all society; the lobby and shoddy life which, originated at Washington, infects the whole country with its poisonous breath, and stifles all really republican sentiments,—all these sad facts which fill the heart of every true friend of liberty with grief and anxiety, are mostly the consequence of that institution which places the welfare and the ill-luck of the greatest Republic and also one of the most powerful and important countries of the world into the hands of one man, who, even under the most favorable circumstances, is apt to err.

Section 2 of Article II. of the United States Constitution invests the President of the United States, among others, with the following powers: He is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. He may grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States; he may, with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate, make treaties, and shall nominate and with the consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for. If thus we closely examine the several powers with which the President of the United States is intrusted, we shall find that they are greater than those of a constitutional prince, as for instance the monarch of England or Belgium. The Constitution, of course, according to the model of Montesquieu and the British Constitution, speaks of three powers, the legislative, executive, and judicial, to mutually balance each other; but as circumstances have meanwhile formed themselves, especially since the administration of Jackson, from which time dates the phrase, "To the victors belong the spoils," we cannot speak of an equilibrium any more, but the centre of gravity in our whole political machine rests in the person of the President, who, if he has the will to do it (and Jackson as well as Andrew Johnson have had this will and have done it), can literally realize the suitable expression, "King or autocrat in a dress-coat."

A really incredible weakening of the independent judicial power is visible in the fact that the President nominates and appoints that person who in some cases might become a party interested with the President; also the independence of the legislative power is made more than a mockery by his veto-right, and by the means which he has at hand to corrupt unscrupulous Senators and Representatives. Although it is a fact that the citizens of the republic, and especially the native-born Americans, are not conscious of the great danger threatened by this un-republican institution, or at least do not perceive the evil in its total extension, still the political currents of the last years prove that this great contradiction within a republican government is coming more and more to the surface, and that on many sides the intention is expressed, if not entirely to efface it, at least to moderate it and make it less dangerous. What else could the struggles mean against the prolongation of one term, and the movements for a limitation of the presidential power, as for instance the civil service reform proposition?

It is felt that something is wrong in the mechanism of our government, and the wish arises to mend and to change in some way or other. To the conclusion that part of our system rests on false grounds, the public could not yet come, confused and deluded by the waves of the party currents; but the power of events will force it to acknowledge this truth. The present campaign is just well adapted to show to many who were hitherto irresolute where the fault is; namely, that the welfare of the republic cannot depend on the election of one man and the attending reign of a corrupt party, but on the reconstruction of our Constitution, on its democratizing in the meaning of the unlimited self-government of the people. Whoever has heard the last campaign speech of the German ex-Senator, Mr. Schurz, must say to himself: "It must not get worse than it is; palliative remedies can be of no use; it is time that the old way of routine and thoughtlessness be abandoned."

Many citizens agree in the opinion that there is much to be changed and corrected in the Constitution of the United States; that for instance the responsibility of the office-holders and representatives and the right of their electors to remove the same from their places of trust must be established, and perhaps the two-chamber system abolished; but they are also conscious that the agitation for the reform movement, represented by them, can only then prove effectual, if they direct their attention and their strength to but one point, the most important at the time. This is in the present moment the above explained presidential question. In the excitement of an electoral season let every one pay more attention to this question, and even if some, deceived by their special selfish intentions and desires, should be more insensible to the counsels of reason than at other times, in the majority this cannot be the case, and it is probable that the season is the most favorable to plant the seeds of that reform movement.

A political committee was organized on Saturday, Sept. 16, which resolved to set on foot the agitation for the abolition of the presidency, which has to yield to an executive committee of limited power, who are chosen from and dependent on the legislative body, and with the chairman to be elected annually from their own number. The movement of this year is to be made more effectual by an elector for every electoral district, besides two electors for the State at large, the names being printed on the tickets which shall hereby be made legal, at least to that degree, that they will be counted, and the voters will have an estimate of the number of their votes counted and the returns made according to law.

Those that vote the "No president at all ticket" intend by this act only to unite themselves in a powerful demonstration, that they may at the next election join in a strong people's party, formed by all elements that strive for true reform, and compel our opponents to pay attention to our movements and our views. Therefore, unite, partisans of all States, and organize yourselves into corporations for agitation, as we in Wisconsin have begun. Do not alone vote the tickets of the subjoined model, but form headquarters during the electoral campaign for the propaganda of our cause, hold mass-meetings for the representatives of the several tongues, and work for it with word and deed, that this reform idea be energetically spread among the people.

Our Wisconsin citizens from all electoral districts we herewith specially invite immediately to give the undersigned secretary notice which persons they think the most fit to act as electors, and those who are ready to act as such are also urgently asked to send their consent. The time is short, and immediate, resolute proceedings are a necessity. As soon as possible, the undersigned Committee shall publish the names of electors and distribute a sufficient number of election tickets.

THEODOR FRITZ,

Sec'y of the Committee.

All communications to be addressed to Mr. Theodor Fritz, Secretary of the Committee, headquarters 56 Onelda Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

A CERTAIN JUDGE whose pompous and officious ways tempted some of the lawyers to acts which his honor construed to mean contempt fined them $10 each. When they had paid their fines, a certain dry and steady-going old attorney walked up to the bench and very gravely laid down a $10 bill. "What is that for?" said the judge. "For contempt, your honor," was the reply. "Why, I have not fined you for contempt," answered the judge. "I know that," said the lawyer; "but I want you to understand that I cherish a secret contempt for this court all the time, and I am willing to pay for it."

THIS, OF COURSE, occurred out West: astride of a log sat Sam and another sinner, engaged in a little game of seven-up, when a minister came up, who, after a moment's solemn contemplation of the game, laid his hand upon Samuel's shoulder and said: "My friend, is that the way to save your soul?" "Perhaps not," answered Sam, who, having played a card, was attentively considering his hand, "Perhaps not; but it seems about the best thing I can do to save my Jack!"—N. Y. Post.

SCIENCE, as an objective result of sensuous experience, and of the striving of human reason after knowledge, has nothing whatever to do with the subjective ideas of faith, which are preached by a single man as the direct inspirations or revelations of the Creator, and then believed in by the dependent multitude.—Haeckel.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3. 00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER.

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbus holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1876.

WHOLE No. 360.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.
2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.
3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.
4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.
5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.
6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.
7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."
8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.
9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.
10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.
11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.
12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.
13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

PHILADELPHIA is dishonored by her treatment of the Paine Bust. Are there no gentlemen in her Councils?

WHATEVER the result, every honest citizen wants an honest count. There have been frauds enough in 1876: let them stop right here!

HOW TO BE "a very small wood-bird," and yet to retain "an elephantine tread,"—that is the great conundrum of the Boston Monday Lectureship.

MASSACHUSETTS is declared to be a nest of "small philosophers." This must be true, for the smallest of the lot has "peached" on the rest, and let out the disgraceful secret.

THE SIMULTANEOUS attempts to enforce Sabbath laws in various places all over the country ought to attract more notice than they do, and lead to prompt, organized action. They mean more than the public is aware of.

REFERRING to Professors Tholuck and Julius Müller, in an unaccountable burst of modesty the Rev. Joseph Cook said in his Monday lecture of November 6, at Park Street Church: "If these eagles of mighty wings are thus careful of their strength and opportunities, what caution ought not to be exercised on these points by a very small wood-bird like myself?" Thereupon he hopped upon a twig, and twittered, chirped, and pecked with such fury at Professor E. S. Morse, the evolutionist, that he ruffled his own feathers into a state of frightful disorder, and showed that, however careful eagles may be, very small wood-birds are devoid of all "caution" in attempting tasks far beyond their own "strength and opportunities." Really, it is unsafe for little birds to be so belligerent! So much noise may notify Pussy-cat of their whereabouts!

THE NEW YORK Nation, in a review of "Clergymen as Scientific Men" which is so deliciously ironical that we copy it on another page, takes the tread out of the elephant in this remorseless manner: "Reading over the other day the Rev. Joseph Cook's lectures in Boston, in which he demolished the Evolutionists by means of detached sentences from the works now of one and now of another, put together with considerable rhetorical skill and seasoned with flippancy, and presented in such a way as to make it appear that the geologists and biologists and physicists and naturalists—the Lyells, Huxleys, Haeckels, Darwins, Helmholtzs, and others, who have countenanced and supported the hypothesis of evolution, and given to it years or lives of laborious and conscientious investigation—were a set of charlatans or dreamers, whose chief use was to make clerical 'Monday lectures' funny, we confess we doubted whether we had of late heard of any more melancholy spectacle, or one likely to prove more mischievous. What was most melancholy about it was, however, not the assault on laborious investigators by a gentleman whose acquaintance with the subject in hand is at best very small, but the apparent unconsciousness of both the orator and his audience that there was anything absurd or humiliating in his position."

IN THE BOSTON Sunday Herald of November 12, we find a most candid, truthful, and just editorial notice of Mr. Ranney's death, which does great honor to the mind and heart of whoever penned it: "A pure and beautiful young life went out from Boston a few days ago. While here, he did not believe in God or immortality, but the lack of that sweet and inspiring faith did not unnerve him for the work of life or slacken his efforts for the amelioration of the condition of humanity. Though, like Harriet Martineau, he saw nothing in himself worthy of perpetuation beyond the grave, those who knew and loved him saw that in his character which they would not have died and which was to them a guarantee of immortal life. One of his coadjutors in the work of liberal reform, standing by the bier, gave eloquent utterance to this thought, showing that a life of purity and devotion to humanity, though itself unsweetened by the hope of future blessedness, may light in kindred minds the flame which failed to illumine itself. Such a life has, perhaps, achieved a higher mission than could have been wrought by the most reverent faith unsanctified by unique personal worth." If the secular press could always be as upright and unprejudiced in its references to the world's "unbelievers" as the Boston Herald, it would not be long before public justice is done to them in laws and institutions. Even though dead, our friend is still doing noble service to the cause he loved.

THE COUNCILS of the city of Philadelphia laid on the table the letter of Mr. Kilgore presenting the bust of Thomas Paine to the city—a procedure disreputable in the Councils and disrespectful to the donors. The Philadelphia Daily Evening Telegraph of October 26 contained the following:—

Bust of Thomas Paine.

THE DONORS OF THE GIFT TO THE CITY.

Yesterday Damon Y. Kilgore, Esq., presented the following communication to the Councils:—
To the President and Members of the Select Council of the City of Philadelphia:

GENTLEMEN,—On the 13th day of the present month, on behalf of the donors, I sent to the Mayor a letter of presentation to the city of Philadelphia of a marble bust of Thomas Paine.

It is proper to inform you that this slight tribute to the patriotic services of Mr. Paine for the establishment of this Republic has been made by the voluntary contributions of such men as Hon. George W. Julian, of Indiana; Col. T. W. Higginson, of Rhode Island; Hon. Elizur Wright, Francis E. Abbot, John C. Haynes, and Rev. William J. Potter, of Massachusetts; Rev. O. B. Frothingham, of New York; Rev. Robert Collyer, of Illinois; Rev. C. D. Campbell, Rev. J. C. Learned, Hon. A. W. Kelsey, and Hon. J. B. Henderson, of Missouri, together with many other distinguished citizens in all parts of our land.

The matter of presentation was intrusted to a committee resident in Philadelphia, by whom I was delegated to formally present it to the city.

In my former letter, which was laid upon your table, it was not designed to intimate that the donors claimed the right to designate its appropriate place, but I only expressed a preference for Independence Hall.

As I am simply the mouthpiece of the donors, acting for the committee, will you be so kind as to take such action in the premises as will in your wisdom dispose of the matter?

Very respectfully, in behalf of the committee,
DAMON Y. KILGORE.

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, undistinctly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

The Essential Piety of Modern Science.

AN ADDRESS READ BEFORE THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, HELD AT SARATOGA, SEPT. 12-15, 1876.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

The word piety is not a favorite word with rational religionists. I must confess that it is not a favorite word with me. I do not use it any oftener than I can help. When I want to speak of the thing it stands for, and that is very often, I am apt to make a circumlocution. We associate a nasal pronunciation with the word, and we think of the thing as something which is not quite manly or robust. And still the word has been a favorite one with men as manly and robust as any we have ever known or heard of. Was ever a more manly man, a spirit more robust, than Theodore Parker? and how he loved to speak of piety—solid piety, he liked to call it,—how his imagination always kindled at the thought of it, and what tender words came trooping to his call! and how his life exemplified the thing, and by it was exalted, cheered, and glorified! No, my friends, we must not let the devil have all the good words, any more than we must let him have all the good tunes. And piety is a good word; it stands for a good thing,—a thing which there is no other word to stand for; a thing as real as the most real thing you can think of; a thing which in one form or another has always filled a large and honored place in human life, which will fill a larger and more honored place in the future than it ever has filled in the past. If it does not—though to conceive of this is quite impossible,—all the more blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see, for that will be a sad day for humanity. It will be good to die before it dawns.

I doubt not there are some who would be willing to allow the essential morality, or the essential religiousness, of scientific thought, who might still demur at its essential piety. But seeing that there is "a power not ourselves that makes for righteousness," an eternal power, even the moralist is convicted of at least unconscious piety, when he ceases to resist this power, and puts himself in glad subjection to its sway. Of course it is possible to interpret morality so narrowly, so prudentially, so selfishly, that it shall carry along with it no element of piety; but in its higher forms and its more penetrating analysis there is always this element implied; the moral sense can always remember back to when it

"Knew not yet the gauge of time, Nor wore the manacles of space."

"'Twas when the heavenly house it trod,
 And lay upon the breast of God."

But while piety may be only implied in morality, it is not merely implied but also included in religiousness. I do not wish to be dogmatic, but I hold that we gain nothing by stretching words beyond their legitimate meanings, by calling things by larger names than properly belong to them. We have had too much of this in the endeavor to make morals perfectly synonymous with religion. That morals are implicitly religious, I have hastened to affirm; that morals are the best part of religion, I have not a particle of doubt. If we can not have both piety and morality, let us by all means have morality. But morality is coextensive with neither piety nor religion, and it is no service, but a positive disservice, that any writer does who lends his genius or his skill to confound things which ought not to be confounded. And, therefore, while it would be impossible for me to overstate my hearty recognition of the service done by Matthew Arnold, in his later writings, to the ideals of critical truth and personal righteousness, I can but deprecate the energy with which he has lent himself to the unwarrantable conclusion that righteousness and religion are convertible terms, and that any religion not included in righteousness is a mere name for which there is, or ought to be, no corresponding thing. It was a splendid thing to show, as he has shown, that righteousness is the one great word of either Testament; but when he would define righteousness, and, at the same time, religion, as "morality touched by emotion," and show by passages from Epictetus and the Bible that the latter is more religious than the former, just because it is more figurative and poetical, he is no longer a safe or satisfactory guide. We may allow that righteousness is morality touched by emotion, but religion is "morality touched with emotion," and a good deal more. Religion is morality and piety, and the piety part is no mere poetical or emotional appendage to the morality part, but in and of itself a great and wonderful reality,—a reality upon which morality itself depends for its most tender grace and its most glorious inspiration.

For what is piety? It is man's sense of his relation to the informing life of everything that is,—the All, the Infinite, for which we have, and need to have, no better name than God. In one form or another, this sense has never been a stranger to the mind and heart of man. And, for one thing, it has always been a sense of mystery. With the fetiche-worshiper, this sense of mystery attached itself only to the more irregular and apparently abnormal manifestations of power in Nature, and to such objects as by some grotesqueness, or other marked peculiarity, arrested his attention. What but a sort of Christian feticheism is the prevailing disposition to believe that God reveals himself more clearly in a few miracles of doubtful authenticity than in the constant and beneficent order of the universe? Whether the piety of the fetiche-worshiper was a sense of the informing life of everything concentrated around a few more striking objects, or only a sense of the mystery inherent in those objects, we must not be too sure. To me the former statement seems the likelier to be true. A vague and nebulous monotheism would seem to be the atmosphere in which all more or less primitive religious ideas sustain themselves. Surely, it is no belief in one God, nor in a God, but a belief in God, in the divine, in the mystery of universal nature. The Vedic Hindus seem to have had this background of divinity upon which to paint their concrete Indras, and Agnis, and Varunas. Sometimes one or the other of these names is made to gather up the nebulous idea. At other times the worshipper is doubtful by what name to call the all-pervading mystery,—"he who gives life, he who gives strength, whose blessings all the bright gods desire, whose shadow is immortality, whose shadow is death, he who is God above all gods. Who is the God to whom we shall offer our sacrifice?" So the Greek polytheism had its idea of a fate superior to Zeus and all the crowded pantheon; and the Romans had a Deus quite apart from Jupiter and all their other deified abstractions. It may well be, therefore, that piety has always been man's sense of his relation to the Universal Life; but what we have to notice is that this sense, from being originally concentrated around a small number of objects or phenomena of a more striking and apparently abnormal character, has become more and more inclusive as the development of religion and the parallel development of science have proceeded. For science, it must be remembered, is no modern invention, as many seem to think. Religion itself is not more venerable. It is a high-priest after the order of Melchizedek, without beginning of days. At least, we can not travel back so far across the fields of human history that we arrive at times in which there was no science. For science is no more nor less than the perception that some things regularly follow certain other things; in scientific phrase, the perception of uniformities of coexistence and sequence. Some of these uniformities must have been perceived at a very early stage of the experience of humanity, those first which most directly affected the welfare of the individual.

The idea of antagonism between science and religion could never have arisen if piety could only have been true to its own genius, to its sense of universal life, and our relation thereto. But having chosen—or having been, shall we say compelled?—to concentrate this sense around the exceptional and apparently abnormal objects and phenomena that solicited the thought and wonder of mankind, these objects and phenomena came ultimately to be regarded as the sole depositories of the infinite power and life, which hereby obtained a finite character. As the development of science proceeded, the exceptional and apparently abnormal facts were constantly being diminished in number, because their relations of coexistence and sequence were being perceived; and to a superficial observer, the domain of piety seemed to be getting more and more abridged. And if, the more law, the more regular recurrence, the more uniformity, had really meant, the less mystery, the less God, then, indeed, it would have been so, and the ultimate extinction of piety would have been only a question of time. But what was in truth taking place was the transference of piety from the formal worship, the cults of humanity, to the domain of science and philosophy. Manifestly, the science, and philosophy, and poetry of Greece had more real piety inherent in them than the popular worship. Manifestly, the so-called atheism of Lucretius was essentially more pious than the popular cult, or even than Cicero's "decent respect" for the established faith. What in truth was taking place was the transference of the sense of mystery from the apparently exceptional and abnormal to the uniformities of Nature and of life. Whence came these uniformities? Did they not presuppose a power not themselves, adequate to their production? The scientist, everywhere, has taken up the word of the apostle: "Behold, I show you [that is, explain to you] a mystery." But every mystery shown, explained, suggests a deeper mystery. "The more thou searchest the more thou shalt wonder." The meanest flower that blows suggests insoluble problems. We speak of taking it up by the roots. Practically that may be easy enough; but ideally, who has accomplished it?

"Flower in the crannied wall,
 I pluck you out of the crannies,
 Hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
 Little flower; but if I could understand
 What you are, root and all, and all in all,
 I should know what God and man is."

What we affirm, then, is the essential piety of all science. The piety may not be self-conscious, but it is always there. Science may not be conscious of it, but while it is musing the fire burns. But modern science has been, and is, by many thought to be inimical to piety, to be essentially atheistic, unreligious. And certainly there are many forms of piety to which it is inimical. It is not essentially supernatural, or biblical, or Roman Catholic, or Trinitarian; and if piety were coextensive with supernaturalism, or the cosmogony in Genesis, or the biblical astronomy, or history, or morality, or with Roman Catholicism, or Trinitarianism, then to speak of the essential piety of modern science would be absurd, for it is essentially opposed to all these forms of speculation and belief, or, at least, to some of their particular phases. But when we hear that science is inimical to piety, but little more is commonly meant than that it is inimical to these forms of speculation and belief. Now the fact is that there are thousands of religious men inside of Christianity, and millions outside, who care little or nothing for any of these things. That science is inimical to them they do not regret, but rejoice rather, because these things seem to them to be themselves inimical to religion, parasites that hinder its growth and diminish its vitality, barnacles that impede its motion. Were they compelled to think that science is really inimical to religion, either as piety or as morality, how inexpressible would be their sorrow! But no such compulsion is the necessary outcome of the present aspect of events. The essential piety of modern science is every day becoming more conspicuous.

But in making this assertion, it will be necessary to distinguish between what is really modern science and certain scientific tendencies and philosophical speculations which are frequently spoken of as modern science, but which in reality are not fully entitled to this designation. Modern science is one thing and modern scientific tendencies are quite another. When these tendencies have culminated in well-established laws, when induction, and deduction, and verification have proved them to the uttermost, then they are modern science properly so-called,—then, and not before. Thus Darwin's theories of the origin of species and the descent of man are, so far, only tendencies. Whether essential piety can be predicated of these theories is a very interesting question, because they are tendencies of the most striking character, and fall but little short of complete verification. But it is not quite the same as if they were already verified. So with the origin of organic forms from inorganic substances. Thus far, philosophy is much better assured of this than science, and if science tends this way, the tendency is not yet strongly determined, though Mr. Huxley writes: "If it were given me to look beyond the abysses of geologically recorded time to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical conditions which it can no more see again than a man can recall his infancy, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from not living matter." It may be well to ask how this discovery of spontaneous generation, if made, would affect the essential piety of modern science; but it has not yet been made, and it is not yet science. It will certainly be best for us to consider the essential piety of well-established science before endeavoring to estimate the amount of piety likely to be involved in tendencies which are as yet no more than tendencies, however plausible.

Consult the fears of timid theologians, or the doubts of a few isolated philosophers and men of science, or the crude opinions of a class that has reacted violently from the ancient creeds, and you will doubtless be convinced that the essential piety of modern scientific thought is a phrase that does not correspond to anything substantial and indubitable. But if, on the one hand, you will think of what science has achieved, and, on the other hand, of the sentiments which are preëminently religious, which make up the sum of piety, and then of the relation of scientific achievement to these sentiments, you will be convinced that this Saul of science also is among the prophets, that there is that in modern scientific thought which directly fosters all those sentiments which are the life-blood of religion.

The most obvious thing that modern science has achieved for us is a wonderful extension of the universe in terms alike of space and time. We often have occasion to reflect what a small portion of the earth's surface was that world which was subjected to the Roman power, beyond whose bounds the Roman thought there was not far to go. We examine with interest the maps which scholars in the department of ancient geography furnish us of the world according to Homer's conception of it, and the conceptions of Herodotus, and Eratosthenes, and Strabo, and Ptolemy. But, as far short as all these conceptions fell of the real magnitude of our mundane sphere, the conceptions of these same men of the vastness and grandeur of the universe were infinitely more at variance with the conceptions which have been born and nurtured in the house of science within the last three hundred years. The heavens that overarched Copernicus as he watched them from the hills of Frauenburg were not the same heavens, actually, that overarch you to-day, because those heavens are the theatre of constant change, every star there being borne along with marvellous rapidity, although relatively the changes are no greater than are all the time going on in a block of granite.* Actually the heavens have changed, but their appearance to the casual observer is exactly the same now as it was three centuries ago. To the eye of thought how different they are, especially if that eye be the trained eye of a Lockyer or a Herschel! How vast are all these conceptions which modern science makes the daily food of thoughtful men! Into what utter insignificance they dwarf the studded firmament that smiled upon the men of ancient days!

And in connection with this change in our conceptions of the world's immensity, there has been an equal change in our conceptions of the relations of its various parts. The discoveries of Copernicus, who found the earth the theoretic centre of the solar system, and changed that centre to the sun, mark but a single stage in a great process of development. Not longer ago than 1822 a monument was built to him at Cracow with the inscription, then thought to be exceedingly appropriate, "Sto, sol; ne moveare;" the command of Joshua to the sun,—"Stand, sun; move not." But, as Galileo said about the earth, it still moves. Taking all his children and grandchildren along with him, all the planets and their satellites, he is forever hurrying onward with inconceivable rapidity. The fixed stars are no longer fixed. Every one of them, while you are sitting here, is making his twenty or thirty miles a second, and while I am reading this paper will travel through the heavens forty or fifty thousand miles. These relations of motion are not more wonderful than the relations of size which modern science has revealed. The psalmist compared the sun to a giant. But if the sun is a giant, what then is Sirius, a star a million times farther from us than the sun, having two thousand times its bulk, three hundred times its brightness?

But modern science has not enlarged our conceptions of the universe in terms of space and relative significance more than in terms of time. Sciences of every sort have united to enlarge our time-view of the earth, and of the inhabitants of it, and of the great world-system of which it is an infinitesimal part. The beginnings of history now extend far back of that fine morning, Oct. 23, 4004 B. C., when, according to the biblical chronology, as computed by Archbishop Usher, the world was created. The traces of prehistoric man go back thousands of years farther than the beginnings of anything that can properly be called history,—five hundred thousand years, at least, suggests a careful student, Mr. Wallace, though, of course, the same objection may be brought to his argument that was brought to the first discoveries of fossil bones. If to try our faith the Almighty has scattered fossil bones all through the strata, which bones were never at any time component parts of living animals, why should he not, to try our faith, have mixed up with these bones the implements of stone we find among them which seem to bear the marks of human handicraft? Why not believe that Jonah swallowed the whale? But those who do not fancy arguing from the unknown to the unknown will agree with Mr. Wallace, that we are in much greater danger of allowing too little time than too much for the development of man from his original condition. We have "all the time there is" to draw upon. The only objection to extending our time-view is the fear of pushing back the operation of the Deity into a remoter past. But let us once conceive of him as operating not only at the farther end of the whole series of phenomena, but as being the present, all-controlling, immanent Life thereof, and it makes no difference to our sense of nearness to Him, whether the beginning of the universal cosmos was day before yesterday or ten thousand million years ago.

"BULGARIAN ATROCITIES" AND "RUSSIAN INTRIGUES."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I do not, as others, find fault with Dr. Cyrus Hamlin for taking the side of the Turks and Circassians. Though I take the opposite side, I believe that Turks are men like ourselves and like their adversaries. All men have to struggle the best they can, through many obstacles, among which their own ignorance and the difficulty of understanding others, toward the solution of problems sometimes very perplexing. Homer's gods understood that such was the condition of mortals; and though some of them might have sided with the Greeks, they did not consider it utterly unaccountable, or even undesirable, that the Trojans also should have their divine advocates. Least of all am I disposed to join with others in throwing the stone at a missionary when I see him, for the sake of what he deems to be justice and truth, publicly take a position, the very first effect of which will be a falling off in the contributions whereby he lives. I would rather honor and encourage such an unmissionarylike conduct.

What Dr. Hamlin, according to Mr. Alfred R. Wallace (INDEX Oct. 28), relates of the Circassians who left their country rather than submit to the Russian yoke, is certainly made to excite our sympathy for those brave men, their wives, their aged parents, and their little ones. Whosoever, like me, has witnessed the exodus of the Christian refugees of Damascus and Lebanon, after the massacres of 1860, can picture to himself what the transmigration to Babylon must have been, what every migration, at one moment, of a whole population from its country to another must inevitably be.

When Dr. Hamlin (quoting him through Mr. Wallace) represents these people as "driven into exile by a merciless conqueror," we must ask ourselves how much of this rhetorical phraseology is meant to express actual fact. That such an enlightened and philanthropic sovereign as Alexander II., the emancipator of thirty millions of slaves, would allow such things to take place under his authority, is as incredible as that Emperor William gave French cities to plunder, or that our own general Don Pedro, before starting on his round trip, left orders to have all the negroes massacred, in order to find the negro question settled on his return. Russia has millions of Mohammedan subjects besides the Circassians, and likes them. They make very good soldiers. Not all the Circassians have left their native mountains for Turkey, and no general slaughter of those who have remained has been perpetrated. Those who left were "driven into exile" by their own national and religious pride (a feeling which we can honor either in civilized or in savage men); and they objected to the conqueror because he was Christian and alien, not because he was "merciless." The sentence, however, taken alone and interpreted by ordinary rhetorical usage, might mean nothing more nor less than that.

But when Mr. Hamlin (always through Mr. Wallace) proceeds to say, "The Russians had surrounded parties of them with troops, forced them into lakes and rivers, where the Greek priests seized upon them and immersed them in baptism," here, I say, we have a case of relapse into that kind of missionary talk, for rising above which I was, a moment ago, complimenting Mr. Hamlin. That the Greek or the Roman Church, or any other ecclesiastical Church, considers baptism as valid even when administered by force, is a part, indeed, of that Protestant mythology through which Sunday-schools are edified and missionary subscriptions raised. But though the subscriptions are substantial, the facts are not. According to the doctrine of all ecclesiastical churches, from the beginning of Christianity up to the present day, the baptism of a convert must be voluntary on the part of the recipient; or else, beside constituting a most sacrilegious act and the gravest offence against the Church, the ordinance would be entirely null and void. The idea that Greek priests, after baptizing unwilling persons, could have "hung crosses on their necks as a token of conversion," is simply preposterous. Greek priests would rather have torn away from the necks of persons unwillingly baptized the cross that the same persons might have thereto fittingly worn as willing catechumens.

If I may, not from positive information, but from my general knowledge of countries, usages, and doctrines, venture a guess as to how the transaction related by Dr. Hamlin had, if at all, a foundation in fact, my guess would be this. The Circassians, though brave, are a very savage people; some of them, no doubt, Mohammedans, and zealously such; but many of them no more Mohammedans (if we inquired not of their leaders but of themselves) than Christians or anything else. Those indifferent Circassians, who had probably been half converted by the Russian priests, would have been glad enough to remain in their country under the yoke of Russia. But they were compelled by their fanatic and overbearing leaders to join the emigration. Under the circumstances, they watched an opportunity for putting themselves under the protection of the first Russian regiment that they met; and if the soldiers took any part in the ceremony of their baptism, it was not to drive the converts into the water, but to prevent the irritated Mohammedans from tearing the converts into pieces. Of this, the tale, as Mr. Hamlin got it, second or twentieth hand, from the Mohammedans who reached Bulgaria, seems to be an influenced various reading. Those who have been in Europe know, besides, that military displays take place at religious processions and ceremonies, not for the sake of enforcing a creed on unwilling populations, but to enliven the ritual with flags and uniforms.

In importing a foreign population into Bulgaria, a Slavic and Christian country, Turkey had evidently other motives beside charitable ones; and it is not surprising if the Bulgarians, seeing the ripening question of their national independence thus unfairly prejudicated, effectually did (as Mr. Hamlin alleges) welcome the immigrants otherwise than charitably. The "Bulgarian massacres" may have been a terrible retaliation provoked by the Bulgarians themselves. Other are the ways of a civilized, and other those of a semi-barbarous and ignorant people in defending their fatherland. But though the sight of bloodshed and burned villages should always make us shudder, from whatever side, and in whatever proportion or order of priority it comes, there are feelings which we can understand as accounting for the acts of our fellow-men.

As to the usual talk about "Russian intrigue," as if Russia were the real agitator of Christian populations so happy, unless tampered with, to live under the yoke of a Turkish minority, such talk may take in England. She owns India, and might be glad to turn Constantinople into another Gibraltar. But to Americans, who own nobody but themselves and no country but their own, nor wish to, such talk is not satisfactory. The Christian nationalities of Turkey are agitated, not by Russia, but by the nature of their intolerable position, a position which would, long ago, have been decently settled, had it not been for the meddling of England and France, prompted by selfish motives. Russian intrigue in Turkey amounts to this: that it is against the nature of things that a great nation, like Russia, could look unconcerned on the sufferings of a people kindred to her by race and religion. Neighborhood and common humanity would suffice. That Russia wants the Turks to leave Constantinople is likely enough, for it were unconceivable if she did not. That she wishes to take Constantinople, or any part of European Turkey, for herself, is, in my opinion, contrary to all indications. She could not do it without murdering two nationalities, the Greek and the Roman, both friendly to her, and which it has been all her aim to foster and encourage. To the Greeks belong Constantinople and all the provinces intermediate between it and the present Greek kingdom. The Slavic provinces separated from Russia by Roumania and Hungary, though kindred to Russia, as France is to Italy and Spain, have, by geographical circumstances, their destiny pointed to them as a separate Slavic empire, creating within the Slavic race and—with the addition of Roumania and of a Greek empire—within the Greek Church that balance of power which is a guarantee against the bugbear of an overwhelming Russian supremacy.

I am, dear sir, very truly yours,
JULIUS FERRETTE.

SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

A new movement at present exists in this city. Last May a number of gentlemen undertook to institute for the ensuing winter a course of Sunday morning lectures on the subjects usually classed under the head of the "Philosophy of Religion," with this proviso, that the questions involved shall be treated as open ones. The enterprise may perhaps be best described as an attempt to found the "higher life" on certain great ethical truths, and to find in them a satisfactory basis of union whereon thoughtful men may unite amid the increasing divergences in matters of creed that mark the present age. Professor Felix Adler, of Cornell University, has been engaged as lecturer. The lectures are to be preceded by appropriate musical selections. The introductory lecture will be delivered in Standard Hall, at Broadway and Forty-second Street, on Sunday, October 15, at 11 o'clock, A. M.—N. Y. Evening Post, Oct. 11.

MR. HEYWOOD ON THE "FAMILY BANK."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I am glad to see that your well-read columns have attracted a criticism of the "Family Bank" from Mr. E. H. Heywood. If I understand him (but I am not sure that I do), he regards it as objectionable in every point of view. Its main purpose is to enable laboring people to escape perpetual rent by temporarily paying interest, which he dubs "usury." But he objects to interest as well as rent. And indeed they do seem to be about the same thing in principle, though they may differ in degree. But what it is impossible for me to understand is, how Mr. Heywood protects a man's right of property, when he will not allow him to receive either rent or interest, even when another man is willing to pay it. A, a laborer, builds a good house. B, another laborer, who has been losing half his time and strength through having to sleep on the ground under a shanty of slabs, catching cold and rheumatism, would like to hire the house of A, at a rent which he can earn in a third of his time. Does Mr. Heywood object? Do the labor-reformers demand that B shall have the "opportunity" to dwell in A's house without paying him anything for it or doing anything for him? This would not be the "reciprocity" which they also demand, would it?

Again, suppose A sells the house he has built to C, for no matter what sort of money, gold or paper; but for so much as will hire A or another builder who has tools and skill, which B has not, to build another house as good as that which he sold to C. Now he offers to lend this money to B for just the same, or perhaps less yearly interest than that which B was willing to pay in rent—the loan to be repaid by twelve yearly instalments, each instalment to stop its interest. Does Mr. Heywood "protect property" by forbidding any such bargain, and insisting that the money, if lent at all, shall be lent without interest?

This seems to me rather preventing property than protecting it.

Rent of property and interest of money are undeniably disagreeable things to people who must pay them, or not have the use of the property or money. I look upon them as existing facts, which cannot be abolished by statute law without such discouragement to the production and accumulation of property as to send us all back to holes in the ground.

What I hold to as the ground and sufficient motive for the Family Bank is, that there is a choice between these evils of perpetual rent and temporary interest. When we began to keep sheep, some sixty years ago, in the wilderness of Ohio, the wolves were stubborn facts. That dogs sometimes killed sheep was also a fact. Yet we patronized dogs because by their means we suffered less from the wolves. Without undervaluing Mr. Heywood's benevolence in trying to rescue laboring men from both rent and interest, I must confess an entire want of faith in his success, and contend that something will be gained, if we can place the laboring man, by means of his own savings, in a home which he has every motive to improve and beautify, instead of one which he is tempted to waste and abuse.

The trouble with the savings banks of Massachusetts is that through them the savings of the poor are lent at a moderate interest to the rich. This interest, as far as it goes, is a benefit to the poor. But they might have a still greater benefit, if they themselves had a fair chance to borrow at a moderate interest on giving proper security. It is only by getting the use of capital on fair and reasonable terms that a poor man can drive the wolf to a suitable and comfortable distance from his door; and no man has shown this more clearly than William B. Greene in his Mutual Banking, albeit he becomes queerly muddled when he discusses the relation of money to capital.

As to the other writers whom Mr. Heywood quotes against the Family Bank, I must confess I have not read them much; and as to his own writings, after several readings, I entirely fail to understand them, except as self-contradictory. He professes to have found in my writings something favorable to what is called "coöperative insurance" for laboring people. It might do very well for a small society of mutually trustworthy people, all knowing each other; but, when applied on a large scale to people who are strangers to each other, it becomes no insurance at all, for want of any principle of cohesion or corporate vitality. I could easily astonish Mr. Heywood with statistics of its victims.

I am quite aware that the legislature, in granting the charter of the Family Bank, has given the owners of the Capital Stock a privilege of considerable value. That is why I wish it should be owned by laboring men. Let them do what they can to aid Mr. Heywood in securing for them "opportunity and reciprocity," if they know what he means by those words. But, in the meantime, why should not ten thousand of them seize the opportunity of getting eight per cent. per annum for a little of their money—if they cannot do better?

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

TWO IRISHMEN were working in a quarry, when one of them fell into a deep quarry-hole. The other, alarmed, came to the margin of the hole and called out: "Arrah, Pat, are ye kilt entirely? If ye're dead, spake." Pat reassured him from the bottom by saying in answer: "No, Tim, I'm not dead; but I'm spacheless."

"KNOWLEDGE a priori," like all other knowledge, was originally acquired by our remote ancestors, "a posteriori," by sensuous experience, and arose only by long-enduring transmission, by inheritance of acquired adaptations of the brain, out of originally empiric or experiential knowledge "a posteriori."—Haeckel.

CLERGYMEN AS SCIENTIFIC MEN.

Not the least interesting feature in the discussion about the theory of evolution is the prominent part taken in it by clergymen of various denominations. There is hardly one of them who, since Huxley's lectures, has not preached a sermon bearing on the matter in some way, and several have made it the topic of special articles or lectures. One minister in Boston, Mr. Cook, has delivered two or three lectures on it, and Dr. Taylor, in New York, has assailed Huxley's position in a letter to the Tribune. Other ministers have attacked the hypothesis in the religious quarterlies. In fact, we do not think we exaggerate when we say that three-fourths of all that has been recently said or written about it in this country, has been said or written by ministers. There is no denying that the theory, if true, does, in appearance at least, militate against the account of the Creation given in the first chapter of Genesis, or, in other words, against the view of the origin of life on the globe which has been held by the Christian world for seventeen centuries. It would, therefore, be by no means surprising that ministers should meet it, either by showing that the Mosaic account of the Creation was really inspired—was, in short, the account given by the Creator himself,—or that the modern interpretations of it were incorrect, and that it was really, when perfectly understood, easily reconciled with the conclusions reached of late years by geologists and biologists. This is the way in which a great many ministers have hitherto met the Evolutionists, and for this sort of work they are undoubtedly fitted by education and experience. If it can be done by any one, they are the men to do it. If it be maintained that the Biblical account is literally true, they are more familiar than any other class of men with the evidence and arguments accumulated by the Church in favor of the inspiration of the Scriptures; or if, on the other hand, it be desired to reconcile the Bible with evolution, they are more familiar than any other class of men with the exegetical process by which this reconciliation can be effected. They are specially trained in ecclesiastical history and tradition, in Greek and Hebrew religious literature, and in the methods of interpretation which have been for ages in use among theologians.

Of late, however, they have shown a decided inclination to abandon the purely ecclesiastical approach to the controversy altogether, and this is especially remarkable in the discussion now pending over Huxley. They do not seek to defend the Biblical account of the Creation, or to reconcile it with the theory of the Evolutionists. Far from it; they have come down in most of the recent cases into the scientific arena, and are meeting the men of science with their own weapons. They tell Huxley and Darwin and Tyndall that their evidence is imperfect, and their reasoning from it faulty. Noticing their activity in this new field, and the marked contrast which this activity presents to the modesty or indifference of the other professions—the lawyers and doctors, for instance, who on general grounds have fully as much reason to be interested in evolution as the ministers, and have hitherto been at least as well fitted to discuss it,—we asked ourselves whether it was possible that, without our knowledge, any change had of late years been made in the curriculum of the divinity schools or theological seminaries, with the view of fitting ministers to take a prominent part in the solution of the increasingly important and startling problems raised by physical science. In order to satisfy ourselves, we lately turned over the catalogues of all the principal divinity schools in the country to see if any chairs of natural science had been established, or if candidates for the ministry had to undergo any compulsory instruction in geology or physics, or the higher mathematics, or biology, or paleontology, or astronomy, or had to become versed in the methods of scientific investigation in the laboratory or in the dissecting-room, or were subjected to any unusually severe discipline in the use of the inductive process. Not much to our surprise, we found nothing of the kind. We found that, to all appearance, not even the smallest smattering of natural science in any of its branches is considered necessary to a minister's education; no astronomy, no chemistry, no biology, no geology, no higher mathematics, no comparative anatomy, and nothing severe in logic. In fact, of special preparation for the discussion of such a theme as the origin of life on the earth, there does not appear to be in the ordinary course of our divinity schools the smallest trace.

We then said to ourselves, But ministers are modest, truthful men; they would not knowingly pass themselves off as competent on a subject with which they were entirely unfitted to deal. They are no less candid and self-distrustful, for instance, than lawyers and doctors; and a lawyer or doctor who ventured to tackle a professed scientist on a scientific subject to which he had given no systematic study, would be laughed at by his professional brethren, and would suffer from it even in his professional reputation, as it would be taken to indicate a raw and untutored state of mind, and a dangerous want of self-knowledge. Perhaps, then, the training given in the divinity schools, though it does not touch special fields of science, is such as to prepare the mind for the work of induction by some course of intellectual gymnastics. Perhaps, though it does not familiarize a man with the facts of geology, and biology, and astronomy, it so disciplines him in the work of collecting and arranging facts of any kind, and reasoning from them, that he will be a master in the art of proof, and that, in short, though he may not have a scientific man's knowledge, he will have his mental habits.

But we found this second supposition as far from the truth as the first one was. Moreover, the mental constitution of the young men who choose the ministry as a profession is not apt to be of a kind well fitted for scientific investigation. Reverence is one of their prominent characteristics, and reverence predisposes them to accept things on authority. They are inclined, too, to seek truth rather as a means of repose than for its own sake, and to fancy that it is associated closely with spiritual comfort, and that they have secured the truth when they feel the comfort. Though last not least, they enter the seminary with a strong bias in favor of one particular theory of the origin of life and of the history of the race, and their subsequent studies are marked out and pursued with the set purpose of strengthening this bias and of qualifying them to defend it and spread it, and of associating in their minds the doubt or rejection of it with moral evil. The consequence is that they go forth, trained not as investigators or inquirers, but as advocates, charged with the defence against all comers of a view of the universe which they have accepted ready-made from teachers. A worse preparation for scientific pursuits of any kind can hardly be imagined. The slightest trace of such a state of mind in a scientific man—that is, of a disposition to believe a thing on grounds of feeling or interest, or with reference to practical consequences, or to jump over gaps in proof in order to reach pleasant conclusions—discredits him with his fellows, and throws doubt on his statements. We are not condemning this state of mind for all purposes. Indeed, we think the wide-spread prevalence of the philosophic way of looking at things would be in many respects a great misfortune for the race, and we acknowledge that a rigidly-trained philosopher would be totally unfit for most of a minister's functions; but we have only to describe a minister's education in order to show his exceeding unfitness for contentions such as some of his brethren are carrying on with geologists, and physicists, and biologists. In fact, there is no educated calling whose members are not, on the whole, better equipped for fighting in scientific fields over the hypothesis of evolution. Our surprise at seeing lawyers and doctors engaged in it would be very much less justifiable, for a portion at least of the training received in these professions is of a scientific cast, and concerns the selection and classification of facts, while a clergyman's is almost wholly devoted to the study of the opinions and sayings of other men. In truth, theology, properly so called, is a collection of opinions. Nor do these objections to a clergyman's mingling in scientific disputes arise out of his belief about the origin and government of the world per se, because one does not think of making them to trained religious philosophers; for instance, to Principal Dawson or Mr. St. George Mivart. Some may think or say that the religious prepossessions of these gentlemen lessen the weight of their opinions on a certain class of scientific questions, but no one would question their right to share in scientific discussions.

We are moved to speak on this subject by the regret which we feel at seeing educated and influential men, from perhaps the most influential body of educated men in the country, helping by their example to spread the already too prevalent delusion that training is not needed to enable a man to talk or think with profit to himself or others on any subject; and it is a delusion which—let us say—helps to cut the ground from under the feet of religious as well as of other teachers. It furnishes the subtle poison which debauches politics, and makes so much labor in all fields slight and inefficient, and which renders education hasty and slipshod, and scholarship shallow and pretentious. Reading over the other day the Rev. Joseph Cook's lectures in Boston, in which he demolished the Evolutionists by means of detached sentences from the works now of one and now of another, put together with considerable rhetorical skill and seasoned with flippancy, and presented in such a way as to make it appear that the geologists and biologists and physicists and naturalists—the Lyells, Huxleys, Haeckels, Darwins, Helmholtzs, and others, who have countenanced and supported the hypothesis of evolution, and given to it years or lives of laborious and conscientious investigation—were a set of charlatans or dreamers, whose chief use was to make clerical "Monday lectures" funny, we confess we doubted whether we had of late heard of any more melancholy spectacle, or one likely to prove more mischievous. What was most melancholy about it was, however, not the assault on laborious investigators by a gentleman whose acquaintance with the subject in hand is at best very small, but the apparent unconsciousness of both the orator and his audience that there was anything absurd or humiliating in his position. Let us assure the ministers who enjoy and participate in this sort of sport that it is not the men of science they are injuring or degrading; it is their own order and vocation. If they will only look back, they will see that the history of the relation of religion to science has consisted in the main of the acceptance by theologians of scientific hypotheses over which they at first laughed or were angry, and that this acceptance has only damaged theology when the acceptance was grudging or ill-tempered. How many unpleasant and at first sight formidable truths have been swallowed since the day when the proposition over which the Rev. Joseph Cooks of the time doubtless made merry, that the earth was not the centre of the solar system but only a satellite of the sun, was first produced! Would it not be best for religion and morals to give up a struggle in which they may lose much and can win nothing? Can there be any gain wrought for either by pretending that there are some subjects on which one may be qualified to talk without having studied them? The world is not so simple as it used to be, or so ignorant. Plain people all over the country, in our day, know enough about the methods of scientific investigation to be familiar with Newton's Rule that a hypothesis which will explain a phenomenon, and against which no fatal objection is known, is a good and proper hypothesis to work on in investigation; and they see that the hypothesis of evolution does fulfil these conditions, and they expect those who assail it to produce one that will take its place. This ministers do not do. The Mosaic account of the Creation explains nothing which now puzzles us. For—to use the dilemma presented to Mr. Cook by a distinguished physician—if men are the offspring of a single pair, and environment has not, as the Evolutionists say it has, modified them in character and conformation, what has caused the difference between Australian aborigines and Anglo-Saxons in the short space of six thousand years? If, on the other hand, the difference be due to the descent from a number of separately created pairs, what becomes of the Mosaic account? People are pondering these questions seriously, and they cannot be dismissed with a laugh. Would it not be well, therefore, for ministers to abandon the attitude of angry fugitives towards science, and await its discoveries with calm, and watch the tentative efforts by which all its truths have been revealed with friendly or, at all events, courageous interest? For though a good ally, it may be a terrible because inevitable enemy.

CATHOLICISM IN A VILLAGE SCHOOL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRIBUNE:

Sir,—Lima, in Livingston County, is the former seat of Genesee College and the present location of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. The following is substantially the condition of the public school: One small, shabby building, situated on Main Street, accommodates such of the pupils as do not attend the seminary or the Catholic school. Containing two rooms, it will accommodate about fifty pupils. It is poorly lighted, poorly ventilated, and meanly furnished. This is the only building the district owns, yet it boasts of a population of twelve hundred or fourteen hundred, and taxable property to the amount of $700,000 or $800,000. In this building there are two teachers, who do their very best; but they work to a great disadvantage. In another part of the town, and in the same yard with the Catholic Church, is another building in which a majority of the pupils of the village are taught by three Sisters of Charity. The building was formerly the Catholic Church, and was moved to its present site to make room for a new church. This building is well lighted and ventilated, and furnished with modern school furniture, including a good piano. There are three rooms, and ample accommodations for one hundred and fifty pupils. No religious exercises are held during school hours, but the garb of the teachers and the very atmosphere of the place, and the surroundings exert a silent influence as potent as the celebration of the mass itself.

Yet all this is paid for by the district, under the pretext that it is a part of the public schools. The building is owned by the Bishop of the Diocese of Western New York, and as these Sisters have taken vows of poverty and obedience, their wages of course go to the Church; so the people of Lima every year raise a certain sum by tax, and receive a certain amount from the State, and from these sums pay annually from $500 to $700 almost directly into the treasury of the Diocese of Western New York. The trustee is elected in the interest of the Catholic Church. This state of affairs has existed so long, that it has become a saying that Lima maintains a school almost entirely in the interest of Roman Catholicism. Doubtless the public school building is too small to accommodate the pupils of the district. Let the people erect a building adequate to their needs, one that would be an ornament to their beautiful village. Do the people realize the danger of the course they are pursuing? Are they aware that the Department of Public Instruction may at any time deprive them of their public money? Are they aware that they cannot force collection on a single dollar of their school-tax? These are questions that they should consider. Sooner or later the seminary, under the pressure of normal and union free schools, must go down, and like its sister institutions at Albion, Medina, and elsewhere, be supplanted by a union free school. When this is attempted, the people of Lima will feel the full strength of the fetters that are being placed upon them. CENSOR.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

HEREAFTER:

"Warte nur; baldes ruhest du auch."—GOETHE.

TIME, Midnight.—Scene, a sick chamber: Julius sits by the bedside of his dying father.

FATHER.

Julius, my sands of life are running low. My hours are numbered, and thou holdst a hand Which soon must rest as marble in thy grasp. To-morrow's sun will look on thee bereaved Of him who gave thee life and who has reared His only son with tender, loving care.

JULIUS.

Father, I cannot through my blinding tears See now thy features, which to me have seemed The index of a soul so pure and kind, That I have almost worshipped while I loved Him who to me was father, brother, friend. My life will seem all desolate when thou, My guardian and instructor, art no more.

I cannot think it true that I so soon Must hear for the last time thy gentle voice Inciting me to noble aims of life (Weeps.) Yet tell me, father, is there aught that thou Wouldst give me as a last, a dying charge? Doubt not, I'll do it, if 'tis in my power.

FATHER.

Nothing, my son; the wishes of my heart For thy great life-work are already known. Go steadfast on with nobleness of soul In the high path thou treadest with honor now; So shalt thou also, when life's evening comes, Lie down with equanimity to die.

JULIUS.

Father, of all the problems of the soul Which we have oft discussed, there is not one Which has so occupied our thoughts as this:— Is man immortal? Is he still to live In conscious being after this frail clay Is decomposed to native dust once more? When last we spoke of this, thou hadst no light, No fixed assurance of another life; The future looked impenetrably dark, And immortality was held by thee Not as a certainty, but as a hope. How does this awful question now appear, Now when the flame of life is burning low And Death's dread shadow holds thee in its gloom?

FATHER.

The same, my son, as when the ruddy blood Was coursing healthfully through all my veins, And when that seemed a subject quite abstract, Which never could have reference to me, A living, breathing man in the full flush Of health and vigor. It is as you say: I then could find no proof that we should live Beyond this brief existence, though I held Of such a future life a solemn hope. I see no clearer light than then I saw, Yet I am calm and die without a fear, Of this assured, that nothing I can do Will change a hair's breadth that which is to be. 'Tis well if I awake; 'tis also well (Perchance e'en better), if I sleep; for who Can tell what mode of being may await The soul which leaves its tenement of clay? Therefore I rest in perfect peace of mind: My only grief to say farewell to thee.

JULIUS.

My Father, I confess 'tis without hope That I approach thee with a strange request; But I would fain try every mode which may Throw light upon the gloom beyond the grave. 'Tis claimed by many that their absent dead Hold converse with them still from spirit realms. We oft have smiled at this thought in contempt, And ridiculed such fancies as absurd; Yet, father, if in truth thou still shouldst live After thy spirit quits this mortal frame, And canst by any means convey to me News merely of the fact of such a life, I do implore thee, by our mutual love, Reveal it to my lonely, broken heart! Come to me as I sit beside thy form, Before I lay it in the silent grave! A constant, loving watch I'll keep for thee, Longing and waiting for thy slightest sign.

FATHER.

My son, thou knowst I had a brother once, Who died a score of years since, in the flower Of beautiful young manhood?

JULIUS.

Father, yes.

FATHER.

When he lay dying, as I do to-night, His bright eyes clouding in the film of death, With bitter tears of grief and broken words I made of him the same request which thou Hast made of me.

JULIUS.

And what was the result?

FATHER.

Dead silence! Never from behind the veil, The dark, thick shroud which hid him from my sight, Came voice or sign. And so it is with all. I pity those deluded souls who sit Gaping and trembling round a creaking board, Invoking through shrewd tricksters their loved dead! Dismiss all possibility of such A revelation from another world, And learn to live on, patient and resigned, Until the mystery is solved by Death.

JULIUS.

So be it, then! But how profoundly sad That such must be the fate of every soul! To yearn unutterably for the light, To crave with bitter tears that blessed boon— The sweet assurance of a future life, And yet to be compelled to calmly wait, See one by one the dear ones all depart, Nor know what fate is theirs beyond the tomb! How horrible that not a ray of light Comes from that darkness, on whose border land We say the last farewell to those we love! Alas! what are we? Puppets that are made To dance their part out on a reeling stage? Or, weaklings though we be, have we a spark Of that divine essence which shall live, Nay, more, must live through everlasting years?

FATHER.

Draw back the curtain, Julius; let me look Once more upon the glorious expanse Of glittering worlds upon their rhythmic dance. (Julius draws back the curtain.) See yonder brilliant orb! Its waves of light, Moving with swift pulsations through the depths Of azure space, fall now upon my eye Fatigued with years of travel since they left With lightning-like velocity their source. Around that distant sun move glowing worlds, Abounding doubtless like our own with life. Such suns and systems are dispersed through space As motes in sunbeams,—what then is our earth? A speck in vast immensity's domain! Moreover, from this speck, while yonder clock Ticks out its smallest increment of time, There pass away full thirty human lives! What then is mine? By what audacity Can I claim endless being as my right? If it shall be my lot to re-awake In conscious continuity of self, Why then I shall rejoice,— (gasps suddenly).

Ah! this keen pain

Comes once more—in my heart. Thy hand, my son! 'Tis dark!—I see no more thy face. Farewell! I'll press thy hand—till—I—

JULIUS (kneeling and clasping his father's hand: after a pause.)

And this is death!

His hand grows icy cold within my own; His breath grows fainter, and the flame of life But flickers in its socket ere it dies! My father! Canst thou hear me? It is I! Press but my hand once more if thou dost hear! Gone! Gone! and whither? Is this icy clay, Which here I kiss, the father whom I loved? These are his features,—these his loving hands Which but a moment since pressed mine again. So have I seen him often lie in sleep; But from this sleep, alas! no filial voice Can e'er awake him! Still the starry light Falls gently on his eyes, which take no note Of that which kindled thought a moment since! Was there a soul which ruled in this dear form, Which willed, and loved, and thought,—a conscious self?

Distinct and free from its environment? An entity which nothing can destroy Nor yet diffuse or merge into aught else? Or was it but a part of the great whole, A drop of water prisoned in a shell And floating on the bosom of the sea, Which at the breaking of the shell by Death Has mingled once more with its parent waves? Or yet again, was it a kind of force, Like that which animates the waving plant And draws the juices upward to its leaves, Which now has been released from this poor form To work in others that we know not of? If so,—'twere vain to ask its present place Or mode of action, as 'twould be to seek The whereabouts of an extinguished flame, Or of the breeze which lately fanned my cheek. Insoluble enigmas! who can know The end of this poor, transitory life? Well did my father say: "I calmly rest In peaceful equanimity of soul, With firmness waiting that which is to be." With such a calm philosophy of life He passed away, without a shade of fear. He could look back upon a life well spent, With powers used wisely for a noble end. 'Tis well. If still he lives, those powers will be More ripe for future usefulness. If not, Yet think upon the good they have achieved, Which still remains on earth in worthy lives Ennobled, aided, and reclaimed by him. Such immortality he has attained, And thus can well dispense with added life, If it should be denied. Here, father, here On thy dead form, which I bedew with tears, I vow to strive thus for a deathless life: A life which shall continue in men's souls Long after I am gone; a constant power Inspiring them to pure and noble deeds, And raising them from worthlessness and vice! Such power is now thy immortality! Thou liv'st again in me and hundreds more, To whom thou didst impart thy lofty thoughts, Thy generous impulses, thy tender love. So may I live, forevermore a source Of lasting good on this evolving globe In the sad drama of our human life!

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

MR. CEPHAS B. LYNN has our thanks for copies of his excellent lectures before the Free Lecture Association, published in the New Haven Journal and Courier. He is at present lecturing in Springfield, Massachusetts, and always speaks a fervent word for all that is good and true.

IN THE New York Tribune of October 30, this paragraph appeared: "Another 'miscent letter' has turned up, this time in Cleveland. It is said by the Cleveland Herald to have been received by a 'highly respectable business firm' in that city, and to have been sent there by mistake instead of to Wisconsin. The writer of it, James C. Devan, had been on a visit to the Democratic head-quarters in this city, and thus described his success: 'They promise us aid, but say it must be through the State Committee. Hewitt was so occupied that I had no opportunity to talk to him as I wished. A few minutes with the Governor, however, who happened in the city, did as well. He talks hopefully, but is solicitous about Wisconsin, and thinks there is a possibility of its vote determining the election. Among other things which I will tell you, he feels the necessity of a full Catholic vote, and wishes its importance cautiously urged upon the priests and officers of the Church. The fact should be remembered by them that the school question has been dragged in issue in some States, and that the Democratic party is their true friend. He wants them reminded that he and the party are constantly assailed for the Gray Nuns act and such favors, and for the Church to be laggard now would be little less than treachery. This matter he wishes to have looked after with the utmost caution and outside of committees, and by none not of our order.' This is exceedingly interesting, if true."

THIS TOUCHING little note, written without a thought of publication, we desired greatly to add to our editorial article of last week, to close with befitting tenderness a painfully inadequate tribute to a most lovely character. But we could not venture to do this without the writer's permission, which being obtained, we can no longer withhold so fair a flower from the fresh-made grave of one whose memory is itself a flower of imperishable beauty to all who knew him well:—

NEW BEDFORD, Nov. 3, 1876.

DEAR ABBOT:—I mourn to see the black-lined announcement of Ranney's death. I had learned greatly to esteem and admire him for his keen intelligence and thorough uprightness and sincerity. And I should have come, I know, greatly to love him, had I been thrown into close intimacy with him. I keep thinking how deeply you must feel the loss! He was a quick and wise counsellor, and there on the spot ready and faithful to aid your efforts. It will be difficult indeed, if not impossible, wholly to fill his place in the Index Association. And in other ways, too, he will be sadly missed in our liberal work. But his poor wife and children—how unutterable the sense of loss and desolation that has suddenly befallen them! Oh, the tragedies in our human lot! Faithfully yours,

WM. J. POTTER.

A THIRD GREAT PARTY.

At this writing the result of the Presidential election is still involved in uncertainty. It is only with regard to the question of State Secularization that we propose now to speak of it. This question is daily assuming greater importance in the eyes of every thoughtful and observant citizen; nor will it be very long before even the thoughtless will be compelled to give it the attention which the grave issues it involves ought years ago to have secured for it. THE INDEX, at least, has done its full duty during the past six or seven years in endeavoring to promote popular enlightenment on this subject, and also in endeavoring to stimulate the American people to such public action as the situation has demanded. Twenty-five years hence (and probably much sooner) thoughtful men will look back to this period of our national history with utter amazement that the truth could have been told so plainly, so persistently, so earnestly, and yet have been received, with comparatively few exceptions, with such general incredulity and apathy. "What were the statesmen of that day about," it will be asked, "and above all what were the chief representatives of advanced religious thought about, that the beginnings of the great struggle over the Christianization or secularization of the government could be at the time pointed out week after week for years, with explicitness and absolute clearness, and yet the warnings be almost universally disregarded, despised, denied, or even treated with senseless ridicule?"

No matter which of the great parties is to see its candidate elected and itself placed in national control, this question of State Christianization or State Secularization is all the same going to press forward for solution into the arena of party politics. American political institutions are to-day in a state of unstable equilibrium; they cannot withstand the pressure of the opposing religious forces; they must either become wholly Christian or wholly secular in the end, whether that end comes speedily or late. If they are to become wholly Christian, then the further question is—shall they become wholly Catholic or wholly Protestant? These are the three alternative certainties: Catholic Christian, Protestant Christian, or absolutely secular. Just as the Roman Empire had to decide between Pagan or Christian government, so the American Republic has to decide between Christian or secular government. And the nation is already beginning to enter the "valley of decision."

Suppose that the Democratic party prevails in the present contest, and holds a preponderance of power in the national government: what is then to be expected with reference to the question of State Secularization? In that case, it seems improbable that any school amendment to the Constitution will be actually passed in the next Congress. The Catholic Church is coming more and more to control the general policy of the Democratic party on all politico-religious questions, and knows its own present powerlessness to carry its secret purposes into execution by any means so overt as that. The danger to the public school system from Catholic schemes, against which the Blaine amendment was aimed, will simply grow unchecked; the gathering clouds will simply be allowed to become more and more highly charged with electricity, to launch a more terrific bolt at last. Instead of being concentrated in Congress, and decided by the people in the shape of a Constitutional amendment, the school controversy will be diffused over the whole country, to poison the peace of every neighborhood in which the Catholic Church is strong. This Church has political objects to gain, which it hopes and intends to gain by means of the Democratic party; and whenever this party comes into national power, the Catholic Church comes into power with it. As one straw betraying the course of the current, witness the following despatch from New York city in the Boston Journal of November 11, signed by "Burleigh," the Journal's well-known and trustworthy correspondent:—

"The Catholics took the field as Catholics in Brooklyn. I have before me a handbill, issued under Catholic authority, and sent to the Catholic voters of the city. The one I have was sent to a gentleman supposed to be a Catholic. His wife was of that faith, but he was not. The sheet is a white one, embossed with the Cardinal's coat of arms; crosses under this, and under that a running line, reading: 'Catholic first, citizen next. Bishop Gilman.' The circular is filled up with advice to Catholics to make their influence felt, and the name of every candidate for office who is a Catholic was printed plainly on the circular. Of course the Tilden electors are not omitted. Our people are quite sensitive on the subject of the tampering with our public schools, turning the Bible out of some, and Protestant teachers out of others. When this matter comes into politics, as it certainly will come, this direct interference of the Catholic priests with the great national election will surely be remembered, and, like chickens, will come home to roost."

The perfectly unmistakable tendency of the Democratic party is to permit without obstruction the political interference of the Catholic Church. However vehemently individual Democrats or credulous "Liberal Republicans" may dispute the fact, no citizen who values secular government as the only possible protection of equal religious rights for all will allow himself to be deceived or befogged. Behind the Democratic party stands the Church of Rome, veiled from public view, but not from public suspicion; its power is so great over the Catholic vote that the Democratic leaders do not dare to resist its secret, unacknowledged, but potent influence. That is the danger on the one hand, and to despise it is dreary infatuation.

On the other hand, the same statement of "Burleigh" reveals with equal clearness the danger which threatens the country from the triumph of the Republican party. "Our people are quite sensitive," he says, "on the subject of the tampering with our public schools, turning the Bible out of some and Protestant teachers out of others." In these words the Boston Journal, a prominent Republican organ of the partisan type, simply indicates the predominant purpose of its party to keep the Bible in the schools, with Protestant teachers to read it. If this party wins the still doubtful election, it will be extremely likely to attempt to strengthen itself (all the more because of its evidently reduced majority) by appealing to the Bible-sentiment of the great bulk of its supporters, backed as it is by the widely ramified and rapidly consolidating Evangelical organizations of the country. The Senate amendment to the Constitution, adding to the Blaine amendment (which was merely a blow at the Catholic Church) a positive though indirect recognition of the Bible as a Divine revelation, meant a great deal more than the honest liberal public are as yet willing to believe. It foreshadowed a policy. A mere looker-on can see that the defeated Senate amendment is to-day the most available weapon in the hands of the Republican party for fighting its way back to its old unquestioned supremacy; will the party managers be less astute on a matter involving their own hold of power? That amendment was made a strict party measure in the United States Senate; every Republican voted for it, and every Democrat against it; and the vote stood twenty-eight in favor of it to sixteen against it. What more improbable than that the battle thus begun, in which the Democrats were forced (against their will, perhaps) to represent the Catholic Church, while the Republicans came forward as representatives of the great Evangelical majority, should be suddenly and absolutely stopped? Sheer party shrewdness will forbid such an end of it. If the Republican party has indeed carried the national election, it is by a very small majority; and there is nothing so certain to convert this small majority into a large one again as a bold identification of the party policy with the prevailing religious faith of the people. The Republicans have gone too far not to go farther. They already stand committed to an amendment to the Constitution on the school question; they already stand committed to make this a Bible-recognizing amendment; they cannot afford to cheat the monster which they have dared to awaken. Back of the Republican party stands the Protestant Church—not so compact in administration as the Church of Rome, but just as compact in its devotion to the Bible as the Church of Rome is in its devotion to the Pope. And the Republican party is just as powerless to resist Protestant Evangelical influence as the Democratic party is to resist Catholic influence. It will use heterodox orators of eloquence and genius like Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll to carry an election with, and applaud him to the echo till after it is over; but if he tries to mould the party policy on the school question, he will find himself whistling against the wind. No Church, Catholic or Protestant, ever yet kept faith with an "infidel."

To the stern facts that Catholicism and Protestant Evangelicalism, under cover of the Democratic and the Republican parties, are at this very moment waging a tremendous warfare for possession of the Republic,—that it is a battle for power, and nothing else,—and that, which side soever wins, truth and freedom and equal rights must be equally trodden into the mire,—every lover of religious liberty must sooner or later open his eyes, and the sooner the better. A third great party is a logical necessity; it will yet prove itself to be also an historical necessity.

We do not and will not believe that the American people have lost out of their hearts the ideal of a government just and impartial to all mankind, not only with regard to their civil and political, but also with regard to their religious rights. Very well: if they value this ideal still, they have got to fight for it—not, we trust, with powder and ball, but certainly with argument and organization and ballot. The principles and objects of the National Liberal League are just as certainly the principles and objects of a great national party, in the not distant future, as the sun is certain to rise to-morrow; and it seems to us impossible that either of the two existing parties should embrace them. This certainty and this impossibility have been controlling thoughts with us for years; and events are verifying them day by day with a rapidity far beyond our expectation. Read the "Thirteen Principles" and "Religious Freedom Amendment" on our first page; next, ask yourself candidly whether they are true, and whether you expect either the Democratic or the Republican party to adopt them and carry them out; and, lastly, ask yourself whether the American people are, as a whole, going to let those principles be extinguished either by a Popish or a Puritan theocracy. If not, we ask you in turn: how are those principles to be enshrined in the national heart, incorporated in the national law, and obeyed in the national practice, unless the National Liberal League is to grow into a third great national party consecrated to those very ends? Set us down as a visionary and a dreamer, if you please, but we look for nothing less. Perhaps by another name—perhaps by other men—perhaps in another century. But the seed has been sown, and there is not strength enough in all the Christian Church to dig it up. Grow it must and will—or America is already dead in the death of the great, glorious idea which gave her birth.

ENTHUSIASM FOR CONVICTIONS.

A strong tendency is manifest in our times to decri enthusiasm as an element of character. The fact that it may be associated with bad causes and lead to the commission of unworthy acts, added perhaps to a certain predisposition of temperament or mode of philosophy, seems to have induced a large class of persons to depreciate its merits as a factor in the historical development of mankind. They look upon it as a quality of mind rather to be repressed than cultivated; a youthful weakness and effeminacy to be outgrown. A writer representing this class of persons attempts to belittle the epoch of the anti-slavery struggle in this country by calling it "the sentimental period in our politics." Enthusiasm, to them, is only a sentiment, and sentiment they confound with sentimentalism. They look with suspicion at all activity based on moral enthusiasm, and would oppose to it a cold, calculating philosophy of prudential utility. "The philosophy of experience" sometimes they call it: as if there were any human experience worthy of the name which did not include, among its richest and profoundest elements, sentiments and impulses of the heart both moral and passion! These sentiments, impulses, and attractions whence spring the enthusiasms of mankind, may have led into many errors and been sometimes a source of fierce contention and tragedy, yet in them is the dominant vital energy of civilization and social progress. They furnish the motive-power by which all other human activities are to proceed and all other functions are to be vivified.

It is not true, however, to say that enthusiasm is only and always a mere sentiment. Enthusiasm may begin in a thought, a conviction; a thought or conviction reached through a process of reasoning and resting on the most scientific method of observation and induction. A conviction so reached may take possession of the mind with such power as to compel the homage and service of all the faculties. Rational belief may be so strong as to have all the force claimed for inspiration. Conclusions of logic may so thoroughly permeate the mental nature as to impel action with the instantaneousness of instinct. In other words, when ideas, thoughts, convictions, however reached, so forcefully possess the mind of a man by their truth that he is ready to do all and bear all in their service, then we have a genuine enthusiasm. And it is a quality of character that inheres in intellect as well as in heart; that is associated with ideas no less than with sentiments; that has been possessed by some of the most robust thinkers of the human race,—by men of science, discoverers, inventors, scholars, no less than by philanthropists and religionists.

That, indeed, is but a half-formed and ineffective belief, and that is only a mechanical and inefficient philanthropy, which has to consult precedents or compare consequences before it can move for human benefit, and never loses itself in a sublime unconsciousness of its own effort and of the service it will render. Mr. Emerson speaks of an amiable and accomplished person who undertook a practical reform, but who had not the enterprise of love requisite for success. He had adopted it by the understanding only from the books he had read. So, adds the essayist, "We shall still postpone our existence, nor take the ground to which we are entitled, whilst it is only a thought and not a spirit that incites us": a sentence that has a lesson for a good many radical thinkers and believers, who may have the courage of their opinions, but have not enough of enthusiasm for them; whose convictions are still too much in the first stage of thought, and have not yet become spirit and life.

It is not, in fact, until convictions, whether of mental or moral truth, become as it were the mind's instantaneous natural insight, and thence go by instinctive volition into conduct, that we get their full effect in human benefit. They may previously have been the foresight of the understanding, peering into consequences, studying utility, learning by the stern disciplines of experience; but not until the lesson has been so thoroughly mastered that they have become intuitions and enthusiasms, are they capable of manifesting their genuine power. The man who has a perfect sense of honor does not have to stop at every personal emergency to debate with himself what, in the special case, honor may require; he acts, and the beholders from his behavior get a higher definition of the word. So of every mental or moral conviction; it is strong in proportion to the clearness and rapidity with which it passes into action,—that is, in proportion to the enthusiasm that vitalizes it.

What is wanted, then, is not extinction nor repression of enthusiasm, but balance and direction. Let us have knowledge, thoughtfulness, careful study of social problems, careful reading of past human experience,—these, by all means, to give guidance to impulse and steadiness to popular movements. But heaven forbid that any genuine enthusiasms belonging to the human race should be lost! Ardor for truth, ambition for discovery, love for the right and the good, devotion to the beautiful, passion for an ideal, zeal for liberty, courage, persistency, hope, self-forgetfulness, self-sacrifice—these are elemental constituents of enthusiasm; and to take these qualities out of human nature is to take out the core of all great character and conduct and to emasculate the race.

W. J. P.

A RUFFLED WOOD-BIRD.

His Lectureship the Reverend Joseph Cook is in a state of high dudgeon. At the Monday Lecture of November 6, grasping his perch with both claws, and wildly flapping his wings, this irate little "wood-bird" gave THE INDEX a vicious peck with his beak as follows:—

There is in Boston an obscure, but haughty little sceptical sheet, which claims that it ought to be allowed to set the time of the universe for cultivated men. One of the daily newspapers, friendly to this Lectureship, made in its haste the mistake of printing Hegel for Häckel, a dozen times or so in a column and a half. Since I read the Pickwick Papers, I have not laughed more heartily than I did over that mistake. I did not correct it, because I supposed all intelligent readers would see that I could not have been making reference to the great philosopher Hegel, but must mean the physicist, Professor Ernst Häckel of Jena. The Advertiser's report was correct, and had been publicly and repeatedly stated to be the only report in any degree revised by myself, and it could be seen by any one in Boston. I took up the other day this haughty little sceptical sheet, and read that a ponderous champion of Orthodoxy marched weekly in Boston with elephantine tread over the ruins of scepticism; but that, unless sadly misrepresented by a certain daily newspaper, this champion did not know the difference between Hegel the philosopher and Häckel the physicist; for a report of one of the lectures made a dozen times the mistake of confounding the two. Probably a difference so slight as that was too small to be noticed by the ponderous champion of elephantine tread. The paper, in its editorial "Glimpses," seriously gave its readers the impression that it believed this Lectureship ignorant on this point. This is a not unfair specimen of the discussion of Orthodoxy by that sheet week after week. Were this not a characteristic trait I would not refer to it; and, even if it were a characteristic trait, I would not mention it, except on account of weightier considerations. On behalf of the few operatives on the Merrimac who are thus deceived and misled, and whose interests I am going to stand by while I live, and on behalf of a few sophomorical young men in radical clubs who, especially at the West, misquote Boston as authority, and who, as they rarely read both sides, are sometimes a little influenced by the combination of audacity and glitter in this sheet which has so little Boston influence, I must say that for this continuous controversial oleaginuousness, the Index-finger of Shame is to be pointed at THE INDEX.

This peck would have been a serious matter from any other fowl than a "very small wood-bird"; but it has only excited an amused surprise which we hasten to suppress from motives of politeness. We solemnly assure his offended Lectureship, with as much gravity as we can put on for the occasion, that there was nothing "serious" about the paragraph he complains of, except the seriousness of its doubt as to the qualifications of the Rev. Joseph Cook to discuss the evolution philosophy. On this point THE INDEX has, we fear, passed beyond the merely "sceptical" stage, and become a hopelessly dogmatic disbeliever.

In order to smooth the ruffled plumage of the little twitterer, however, THE INDEX hastens to avow its belief that the "newspaper friendly to this Lectureship" did indeed fall into "woful and most unusual injustice" in its report, as was plainly enough hinted at the time; that his Lectureship does indeed know the difference between Hegel and Häckel, and also between a hawk and a heronshaw; and that there is something exquisitely moving and affecting in the tender concern of his Lectureship for the "few operatives on the Merrimac." The thought of these endangered operatives is altogether too much for the quick sensibilities of THE INDEX; it drops a feeling tear over their sad condition, bereaved as they are of the presence of the noble-hearted Lectureship who is going never to "forsake Mr. Micawber," but will "stand by" them while he lives! Heroic resolve! Magnanimous Lectureship! Disinterested little "wood-bird," chirping its evolutionary ditties to the betrayed operatives on the Merrimac, and putting its "elephantine tread" down hard on the toes of the few sophomorical young men at the West!

Not even the manifest inspiration of Mrs. Partington herself, with her "controversial oleaginuousness," shall move us to unseemly levity as his Lectureship proceeds to get hold of the "Index-finger of Shame," and level at the head of THE INDEX that new and extraordinary columbiad of destruction. We have but one request to make, before being annihilated by this impending bombardment: namely, that a competent photographer be present to take his Lectureship in the very act of blowing THE INDEX out of Boston. History has an interest in that little exploit.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY B. C.

The election, as we write, is still undecided, and it is quite possible that several days more must elapse before the result can be known with certainty. Mr. Tilden has received a fair majority of the popular vote, and one hundred and eighty-four electoral votes. The States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana are claimed by both parties, and there is a slight possibility that Wisconsin or Oregon, both of which seem to have voted for Hayes, may yet be found on the other side. The chances, of course, are largely in favor of Tilden, who needs but one more electoral vote. Everyone must regret that the decision with regard to the election appears to rest with the three Southern States above named, for these are the States in which, beyond all others, charges of fraudulent voting and falsification of returns have been most frequent and supported by most evidence. Governor Kellogg, of Louisiana, has requested prominent men of both parties to repair at once to New Orleans and remain there as witnesses of the doings of the Returning Board during the counting of the votes of the State. President Grant has already named a number of gentlemen for this service, and others have been named by the Republican and Democratic National Committees. The situation is undoubtedly a grave one, and if fraud of any kind should be attempted, might be followed by extremely serious consequences. We have fullest confidence, however, that an honest return will finally be made in every one of the doubtful States, and that the members of both parties will quietly—if not cheerfully—acquiesce in the result.

President Grant deserves hearty commendation for the honesty of intention expressed, with reference to the present critical condition of affairs, in a recent order to General Sherman. "No man worthy of the office of President should be willing to hold it if counted in or placed there by fraud. The country can not afford to have the result tainted by the suspicion of illegal or false returns." We believe that neither candidate would be willing to accept office unless honestly chosen, or would in any way become a party to illegal action, and so far as this is concerned, therefore, Grant, Tilden, and Hayes are probably of one mind. But we deeply regret that in the above order Grant should have directed troops to be sent to Florida and Louisiana. We do not understand that any article of the Constitution or law of Congress authorizes the President to send troops into a State in order to insure an honest counting of votes, and the vote in those States, as matter of fact, is probably no closer than in New Hampshire or Wisconsin. We do not suppose that the troops will do any mischief, or that Grant meant any harm; but his order shows the extent to which he looks upon the South as conquered territory, and foreshadows an unfortunate readiness in case of any emergency to appeal to military power without regard to law. For very many reasons we are heartily glad that a lawyer by profession, and not a soldier, will be the next occupant of the White House.

The evenness with which the electoral votes are divided between the two candidates has made very plain the utter inadequacy of present legislation to provide for many possible contingencies with regard to Presidential elections. We believe, for instance, that no provision is made to supply the place of an elector who might be removed by death after he is chosen and before he has cast his vote. If, for example, one hundred and eighty-five Republican electors should be chosen and one of them should die before voting, neither candidate could be given a majority, and as the House of Representatives would then be called upon to elect a President, the Democratic candidate would be chosen, and thus the result of the election would be reversed. Again, there are at present no rules in force with reference to the counting of the ballots after they have been transmitted to Washington and opened by the President of the Senate. Any one can imagine the grievous complications which might arise in case either House of Congress should then object, for any reason, to the counting of the vote of any State. The next Congress, it is to be hoped, will not fail to make provision for some of these contingencies.

If the Republicans are defeated in the present election the defeat will be accompanied by the mortifying reflection that it is caused by their own foolishness and not by any overwhelming virtue on the part of their antagonists. The New York Times, which is universally recognized as the representative of Republicans, admits that the Republican party, with reference to the South, "trifled in a criminal manner with the complications in Louisiana and Alabama, and left the federal service in the South substantially unchanged, with the rank abuses of many of its representatives unrebuked and unatoned for. We have no hesitation in saying that had the South been dealt with in the spirit in which the Wheeler-Foster committee dealt with the Louisiana troubles, and had the federal appointees been held to a strict account, we should to-day have possession of at least seven of the Southern States." Again, speaking of civil service reform, the Times says: "Had the party prosecuted in good faith the reform devised by Mr. Curtis, at the call of President Grant, no such defection would or could have taken place. But pride, obstinacy, and selfishness among the leaders, weariness and indifference on the part of the President, and want of intelligent conviction in the masses of the party, stifled the reform in an early and disgraceful death. Instead of the results we might have had from it, we presented the country with the traffic in post-traderships, the whiskey frauds perpetrated with the connivance of an army of subordinate officials, and the conspiracy between the lobby and the politicians which drove Mr. Bristow and Mr. Jewell out of the Cabinet. So far as the civil service is concerned, we made the bed in which we are not very comfortably lying." In view of these truthful statements we think the most bigoted Republican must admit that many earnest men had some good reasons for voting against his party, and that Mr. David A. Wells was not wholly wrong in the following declaration: "Paint the Democratic party as bad as you may, and there is something worse than their succession to power in the country, and that is the failure to hold the Republican party responsible for its many and manifold sins of omission and commission; for not to do so is to offer a premium for continued bad government, and to make government the vested interests of one party." It will be well for Democrats to remember, if they should now come into power, that they have in no sense earned their present victory; that loss of faith in the Republican party by no means implies perfect confidence in the Democratic party; that few things could be more stupid, politically, than a great deal of Democratic opposition during the past five years; and that their continuance in power can be obtained only by the doing of something better than anything they have proposed to do for the past sixteen years.

We do not understand how any active and intelligent member of either political party could repeat some of the charges of party newspapers against opposing candidates, or read the predictions of the awful things sure to happen in case one man should be elected instead of the other, without a deep blush of shame. Neither party is made up of thieves, perjurers, or blacklegs; nor will this country be allowed to drift upon rocks of destruction by Hayes, or be scuttled and sunk by Tilden. We of course believe that the election of one man rather than the other, would be better for the country under present circumstances, but we believe that our national debts will be paid, whoever may appoint the Secretary who pays them, and we believe that neither Tilden nor Hayes can very much increase or very much depress our commercial prosperity.

Civil-service reform of some kind will be forced upon us before long through sheer disgust with the workings of our present system. We doubt if ever before, in this or any other country, have so many government employes been engaged in party work as might have been counted upon the stump or elsewhere for a month or six weeks preceding the seventh of November. And when the clerks at Washington were informed of the probable election of Tilden, the newspapers tell us that anxiety with regard to the future prevented all occupation. Women wept and men grew pale, and all work at the Department ceased. The beauties of the "spoils" system have indeed been brilliantly illustrated of late. The time will come, we believe, when our successors will regard this kind of civil-service in much the same way as we now look upon the civil-service of Turkey or Dahomey.

The Centennial Exhibition closed on the 10th, and although some facts connected with its early history and subsequent management have not been according to our liking, we believe, nevertheless, that on the whole it has been decidedly successful. More people have attended it than were present at any other international exhibition; the pecuniary receipts have been larger than ever before known; and the articles exhibited compared favorably with those shown at Vienna. The United States will be better known than before in foreign countries; our people have certainly learned some things from others; and various portions of our own country have become better acquainted with one another. Above all, our people present at the Exhibition have behaved admirably, and American manners can no longer be sneered at by the natives of other countries; they may be in some respects peculiar to ourselves, and therefore unlike those of other nations, but they compare well and in some respects more than well with the manners of any European people.

The notorious "Boss" Shepherd, of Washington, has failed in business, or been obliged, at least, to ask help from his creditors. A thoroughly uneducated man, starting in life as a plumber's assistant, setting up for himself as a plumber, and making money out of government contracts in plumbing, he became a builder, real-estate speculator, "boss" of the District of Columbia, and intimate friend of General Grant. Shepherd is an excellent illustration of a class of men with whom the speculative opportunities of the past fifteen years have made us well acquainted. Every large city in the country can furnish one or more of the men of whom Tweed and Fisk are prominent illustrations and "Colonel Sellers" the exaggerated likeness. As a rule they are uncultivated, very energetic, filled with notions of large enterprises, open-handed in money matters, somewhat unscrupulous as regards methods, with but little sense of honor, no delicacy, and fond of show and a good time. They invariably overreach themselves after a time, and falling, seldom, though occasionally, rise again. Grant's encouragement of this class of men has been one of the worst features of his administration. The return of healthier business methods will gradually drive them into obscurity. They can well be spared.

The Episcopalians have resolved upon that which is for them a decidedly novel enterprise—the holding (in Boston, this week) of a convention or "congress" for the discussion of questions of denominational interest. And what is more, they have had the good sense to propose for discussion questions of not only a denominational but also of general interest. "The Morals of Politics," "The Relations of Religious and Secular Education," etc., are among the subjects proposed. This novel project—novel, that is, for Episcopalians—is a thoroughly commendable one, and might be imitated with profit by other denominations.

The way of the Spiritualist medium is becoming more and more hard. The Boston Herald sent a representative, last Saturday, in company with Mr. W. Irving Bishop—the latter disguised as a woman—to "interview," hold "sittings" with, and procure "tests" from a number of prominent mediums of this city. The result of the excursion demonstrated the fact that a large proportion of professional mediums are unmitigated humbugs. The "spirits" invariably followed any kind of false scent furnished by their visitors, and their "revelations" were stupid platitudes or unmeaning verbiage. All honest Spiritualists must be heartily glad of the Herald's crusade. It will have the effect of weeding out a mass of charlatans who have been making money out of weak people's credulity, and will oblige them to seek a more decent method of making a living.

ENGLISH SKETCHES.

BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT.

LONDON, Oct. 15, 1876.

It is strange to note the ever-growing trouble of the Church over the spread of unbelief. At the Church Congress of this year the cry swelled into a general wail, and a special day was set apart to consider the "causes of unbelief." The discussion was opened by the Dean of Manchester, a man of very different character from the Bishop of that diocese. Dr. Fraser, the bishop, is a brave, honest English gentleman, ready to learn, ready to think, glad to improve, quick to recognize his own mistakes, ever fair to his antagonists. He is a man with all possibilities of growth in him, such as we should all desire to be. Dr. Cowie, the Dean, on the other hand, is one of those men who are fond of maligning their antagonists behind their backs, but who fear to meet them face to face. He makes untrue assertions regarding them, and then, challenged to substantiate them, takes shelter in silence. He is far too grand a dignitary, for instance, to meet a secularist in debate, or answer any question from an unbeliever, but not too grand to slander secularists when in an audience of clerical sympathizers, nor too honest to refuse to those he has libelled any word of explanation or apology. It cannot be wondered at, then, that Dean Cowie's paper was absurdly unsatisfactory. His clerical conceit blinded his eyes to the main positions of unbelievers, and he only bestowed upon them a kind of little Sunday-school lecture which could perhaps awe very small children, but was ludicrously inadequate to the necessities of the day. A "debate" ensued; but in a Church Congress the speakers are all on one side, and there is, consequently, no stimulus to induce them to exert their mental ability.

A more important expression of opinion has come from some of the bishops. The Archbishop of Canterbury, as you will already be aware, proclaimed that materialistic atheism was the pressing danger of the times, and his words were endorsed and emphasized by the Bishop of Manchester, who confessed that scientific analysis "did not suggest the idea of God." The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who is now delivering his charge, seems, so far, to have entirely devoted it to the subject of unbelief. You probably know the English system of Episcopal charges. The Bishop, once in either three or four years, delivers a "charge" to the clergy of his diocese. This pastoral address is divided into numerous sections, and the Bishop delivers the first at one town, the next at a second town, and so on, until the whole is gone through. The late charge of the Primate was delivered in seven such sections in seven different places. The Bishop of Gloucester (Dr. Elliott) commenced his charge by considering the spread of unbelief. When he delivered his primary charge twelve years ago, he then, said he, pointed to the rapid spread of unbelief: "I said, if I remember rightly, that I saw even then baleful and ominous signs of that frightful development of anti-Christian error which is summed up not only in the denial of the Son but of the Father; and I ventured to call serious attention to the nature of the current speculations of those times, as suggesting the gradual approach of man's last and worst denial,—the denial of the personality of his Maker and of the adorable fatherhood of God." This unbelief, says the Bishop, grows and grows, and is now founded on science; and, worst of all, it is becoming popular, for scientific thought is spreading in every direction: "A few years ago the results, or supposed results, of modern science were not popularly known beyond the general circle of scientific men." But now things are very different; the knowledge of these results is no longer confined to the few, but is common to the many; and unbelief is no longer shut up in the study of the learned, but passes from lip to lip amid the crowd.

Continuing his charge, the Bishop pointed out that, of the many causes of unbelief that may "be assigned, there are three which seem to claim more especial consideration,—the tone and direction of recent historical criticism, the deductions that have been drawn from the real or alleged discoveries of modern science, and the moral and metaphysical difficulties which have been supposed to be involved in or connected with the fundamental doctrines of Christianity."

The historical criticism is of a most dangerous character, and has exercised a most injurious influence in reference to revealed religion: "Its leading position has always been the same,—that any narration of facts which involves the miraculous element in it, must, for this very reason, be regarded with the gravest suspicion. It is urged that early history in its earliest forms is found nearly always to involve the miraculous, but that investigation and close examination have never failed to show that the evidence on which the alleged miracles rest is totally untrustworthy. If this be so with all ancient history, why, it is said, is the ancient history of the Jewish people to be supposed to form any exception to the general principle? Why, too, it is added, is the same miraculous element in the history of the New Testament to be regarded otherwise than as involving a prima facie reason why the narrative should not be accepted as historically credible? And this presumption is independent, to a considerable extent, of the scientific aspect of the question whether miracles are or are not to be considered as a priori impossible. The case stands thus: a certain element is found in these narratives which, when found elsewhere, in early history, is invariably associated with what critical investigation shows to be mythical and legendary. The simple presence, then, of this element, it is urged, is in itself enough to raise a reasonable presumption against the true historic character of the narrative in which it finds a place."

The Bishop strives hard to meet this objection by pleading that both the Old and New Testaments differ toto celo, from all other narratives involving miraculous occurrences; but the argument limps sadly, and reminds one only of a lawyer for the defence with a very poor case: "And still more serious is the effect produced by the speculative deductions that have been made from the real or alleged discoveries of modern science. He would advisedly say real or alleged, for he was persuaded that many scientific theories of the present day, which are now current and popular, will in the sequel have to be seriously reconsidered and modified."

But more fruitful in unbelief than even this terrible science is moral and metaphysical speculation: "Still more distinctly may we trace the prevalence of unbelief to the moral and metaphysical difficulties which have been supposed to be involved in the fundamental truths of the Christian dispensation. The problem of the existence of evil, especially the traces of the misery and suffering of living creatures, ages before man's sin cast its shadow on the creation around him, the still deeper problems connected with the holy mystery of sin's atonement, and the dark and terrible questions that are connected with the doom of the impenitent,—these three aspects of physical and moral evil do, beyond all doubt, fearfully try the faith of thousands at the present time. Our very increased knowledge becomes a snare to us. The more science displays to us the wonders of the realms of Nature around us, the further we see into the beauty and the glory of the marvellous works of God, the more terrible seems the difficulty connected with the power and presence of evil."

The Bishop does not help us to solve these dark problems. He has clearly himself become a partial unbeliever when he talks of the traces of physical evil "ages before man's sin," for he forgets that Genesis I. leaves no room for intervening ages, while Paul distinctly states that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." And what answer does he give us to our difficulty? These questions he says, "can only properly be met by a faith that finds it easier to believe impossibilities than to doubt for one instant in the mercy and the love of God." Theism, pantheism, and atheism are the three forms of unbelief the Bishop dreads, and he especially protests against the idea that Christianity is "the mere development of Judaism, or the last and presumably the best of a series of revelations of religious thought, liable to be superseded by some development of the future." The doctrine of evolution carried into morals is as terrible a blow to believers in supernatural revelation, as it has been in physics to believers in supernatural creation.

One way of meeting the growing infidelity was proposed at the Church Congress; namely, the establishment of a "penny weekly Church paper for the million to supplant the London Sunday papers of dissenting, radical, and irreligious tendencies."

"Canon Erskine Clarke spoke with more especial reference to Lloyd's Weekly News, and five other Sunday papers, which he calculated had a circulation of about one million three hundred thousand, and had about five million readers. They were read very much and very deeply by working-classes, upon whom they exercised an immense influence. Many of them had a sceptical or atheistical tendency. His suggestion was, that the Christian Knowledge Society should issue a somewhat similar paper. There was a disagreeable unreality in condemning working-men for reading papers on a Sunday, when they openly talked about them and prided themselves on reference to them in the pulpit. The Christian Knowledge Society, even if they sunk some £11,000 a year on such a paper, would still be doing more for the spread of Christian knowledge than by selling books and packets of pictures to their good church-going customers. Or the Society might influence or subsidize one of these papers to which he had referred on condition that it should be made religious in its tone. (Applause.)"

I don't fancy that the Christian Knowledge Society would find it easy to purchase the National Reformer!

CRITICISMS OF A FRIEND.

FALL RIVER, NOV. 3, 1876.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I was exceedingly sorry to see in THE INDEX of the 2d instant that "a few subscribers have discontinued the paper on account of dissatisfaction with some of the political opinions which have been expressed in it."

The liberal spirit of THE INDEX, the noble stand it has taken for freedom, and the important results it has already accomplished should be sufficient to enable its subscribers to overlook a sentiment now and then which does not coincide with their own views. How else can the army of liberals be held together? How else can they remain united until the great objects of free religion are accomplished? Differences of individual opinion are inevitable, and the importance of the final result should forbid any desertion from the ranks in the presence of the enemy.

This principle, which I consider so important with regard to the objects of free religion, I wish to apply to the present political situation of the country, and you will pardon me if I take exception to the positions which you yourself, as well as some of the contributors to THE INDEX have taken.

We are on the eve of a national election, more important, perhaps, than any through which the country has passed, not excepting even the election of 1860, which was so quickly followed by open revolt against the government; for then the traitors were counting on and profiting by the apathy, if not the sympathy, of the President and many of the highest officers of the government and of the army; while now, in spite of a loyal and watchful President, and in the full light of a vivid and recent experience, deeds of violence are committed against the Constitution, and threats are openly made in defiance of the national authority, such as were never dreamed of in the early days of the rebellion.

On the one side we have an aspirant for the Presidential chair who cannot point to a single word uttered in behalf of our country in her dark hour of trial, and who, if he succeeds at all, must do so as the accepted candidate of those who a few years ago were in arms against the United States, and of a portion of the Northern voters, among whom will be found all those known as "copperheads" during the war.

On the other side we have the candidate of the loyal masses who preserved the Union by their money and by their blood, and who are naturally loth to entrust it now to those who so lately tried to destroy it, and who have not yet shown fruits meet for repentance.

One or the other of these two men must, in all probability, be elected, and the influence of every man will, whether he intends it or not, help one or the other.

I agree with you that the question of the complete secularization of the State is of vast importance, and I intend to coöperate most heartily with you and others for this object; but I do not choose to be so dazzled by this idea that I cannot see the importance of the practical questions which are now directly at issue. I abate not one jot or tittle of my devotion to free religion, when I claim that the question of the hour is free humanity, and for this I raise my voice and give my vote. He that is not with us is against us; and he who does not use his influence for Hayes is in effect an ally of Tilden.

The advocates of woman suffrage might be so fully persuaded of the importance of their cardinal principle that they would refuse to give their votes to any who did not agree with them on this point; the prohibitionists might do the same with regard to their main idea; and so the evangelicals and the radicals might act in the same narrow way; but practically it is impossible to nominate a candidate who unites in himself the views of all, and so on account of internal strife among the loyal masses on points of detail (each one perhaps appearing vital to its special advocates), the government is liable to fall by default into the hands of its enemies.

The important question is this: If you think the principles that you consider vital (secularization of the State, for instance), will be safer in the hands of Tilden and the Southern rebels, vote for the Democratic nominees, and frankly throw all your influence on that side. If you are persuaded that those principles will in the main be better guarded by Hayes and the Northern patriots, vote for them, and do not embarrass the great principles of the campaign by inopportune discussion of points which are not at issue.

I am surprised and sorry to see in THE INDEX such sentiments as "R. C." expresses, to which "W. J. P." has so eloquently replied, and I am equally sorry that you have been led (after mature and conscientious reflection, I am sure), to take the lukewarm position that you have done with regard to the presidential campaign; but be assured that this will not detract one iota from my devotion to THE INDEX and its principles.

Before these lines can be printed, the great question will be decided, and permit me to express the hope that, in spite of the defection of many loyal men and the neutral position of others, the Republican party and policy will next Tuesday be triumphantly vindicated at the polls. Wm. ROTCH.

[For the justice and kindness of the above letter, we tender our sincerest thanks. It is especially grateful to us after some recent letters of a quite contrary description.—Ed.]

A MILD ADMONITION.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I hope I do not need any excuse, when I allow myself to express a slight censure on THE INDEX; for no one knows better than you yourself that whatever I may venture to say will be coupled with the highest regard for yourself and the most grateful appreciation of your labors, the warmest interest in and best wishes for THE INDEX. Animated by these sentiments, may I not be permitted to express regrets in seeing here and there more politics talked of in THE INDEX than, I think, may be consonant with its interest and its high character? The political notes of "R. C." in his interesting "Current Events," I deem sufficient for a journal of the character of THE INDEX. His political notes may also be the more tolerated, as they are characterized by a most laudable independence, impartiality, and fairness. Any other sort, however, ought to be carefully excluded, I think, from the pages of THE INDEX for the too weighty reasons: that it is not a political paper, but has a much higher aim; that its readers are adherents to all the various political parties, and partisan politics must offend at least some of them. Even you, my much esteemed friend, allow yourself now and then editorially to "talk politics" outside of the necessary line of demarcation. If, in a journal like THE INDEX, politics must be treated of, it ought to be done in a manner so equitable and impartial that the reader may be at a loss to find out whether the writer be a Democrat or a Republican,—as is the case with "R. C." But all political communications (as, for instance, such as Dr. Horach's in THE INDEX of Oct. 26), ought to be scrupulously excluded. What does the general reader care whether he (Dr. H.) is a Republican or a Democrat, or by what means or reasons he became the one or the other? His reasoning, furthermore, is by no means faultless, and I might point out a number of fallacies in his communication, if I did not consider it incumbent on every correspondent to strictly abstain from "talking politics" in that manner in THE INDEX. It will not make any (political) converts, and surely cannot contribute to the interest and benefit of THE INDEX, but more likely to prejudice some against it. Would you, therefore, not far better keep politics entirely out of THE INDEX (or, at the most, leave them to "R. C." and his "Current Events")?

So our fair hope to see the Paine bust placed among his compatriots in Independence Hall is once more frustrated by a bigoted Council? "How long, O Lord! O how long?" I apprehend much longer yet than a great many sanguinely hope. When I consider the assiduity of the National Reform Association and its influence on Congress and its legislation on one hand, and on the other hand the culpable supineness and disorganized state of liberals, I have but little doubt, for the present and next future, as to the result. Your wise counsels are unheeded, and your patriotic and herculean efforts cannot avert the inevitable. I believe this republic doomed to be brought back into that mental slavery from which monarchical Europe is emancipating itself fast and gloriously. Liberalism there is advancing in "seven-mile boots," as a common German phrase so pointedly expresses it; while here it moves with the "snail's pace." Or, if I must with others admit its rapid growth here, too, it at any rate indisputably lacks the energy and courage of action that so significantly characterizes liberalism in Europe. Considering all this, I am forced to believe that the National Reform Association will carry the day and accomplish all it aims at—for the time. My consolation, however, is that their schemes are not understood by the people, and therefore not opposed as they ought to be, and as they certainly would be if the people knew that this pious Association aims at nothing less than a perfect union of Church and State, the establishment of a State religion, and finally to rob the people of their liberties and freedom. I hope, then, that when the National Reform Association will have gained all it is now striving for, needs no longer any disguise, and begins to carry its plans into practice, the eyes of the people will open; that then a reaction will take place, sweeping off the National Reform Association and its unholy work, bringing about greater and far more wide-reaching reforms than we could effect now, even if all the "Demands of Liberalism" were granted.

The issue between the National Reform Association and liberalism must be met, however, and the sooner it will come the better, let the result be whatever it may. Ultimately liberalism will and must conquer. MORRIS EINSTEIN.

TITUSVILLE, Oct. 29, 1876.

[So kindly a criticism as the above is certainly received in the kindly spirit it deserves. It is true that THE INDEX does not profess to be devoted to party politics, but it is impossible to "talk politics" at all, and say nothing of the parties. Since the State Secularization movement necessarily enters the political arena, therefore, we have found it impossible, in fairness to all, to keep out of these pages all party discussions. But Presidential elections only come once in four years, and they affect the Liberal League movement too vitally to be disregarded when they do come. Mr. Einstein sets us all a good example by his consideration; and we have no fears that many of our subscribers will be found deficient in genuine liberality of spirit. We have tried to give all sides an equally fair hearing, and must trust to the general good sense to pardon any errors of judgment we may have made in details.—Ed.]

"MOLECULAR ENERGY."

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

In your brief comments upon my essay on "Theism" is one remark that I cannot permit to pass unnoticed. You say:—

"What is this 'energy'? 'Energy' is not a mechanical, but a strictly dynamical conception; it is equivalent to 'power' or 'force' in action. All that the strict mechanist could have said would be: 'The only ultimate fact in Nature recognized by the evolution philosophy is molecular motion.' Mr. Lum has unwittingly but fatally betrayed his original thesis, by this admission of 'molecular energy' as an 'operating agent in Nature.'"

No inconsiderable portion of my article was devoted to an examination of the use of the words energy, force, power, etc., from the stand-point of associative psychology; and in the sense there used I deny the alleged "fatal admission."

I had expressly said: "Nature presents nothing but molecular change," and had argued against the metaphysical conception of energy, which, in your comments, you still persist in bestowing upon my words. To conclude, this point was effectually answered in the article itself by the following words: "We have seen that force and power are but words used to describe events, and indicate a logical distinction only, not existing in Nature, but only in the universe as given in thought, and from thence reflected back upon Nature." I may have presented the subject very poorly, and the argument may be open to many and fatal objections; but that I "fatally betrayed my original thesis" I cannot admit, and protest the more earnestly when I discover that the sole evidence given is to give my words a meaning which subsequent paragraphs expressly forbade.

Yours truly, DYER D. LUM.

NORTHAMPTON, Mass., Nov. 2, 1876.

[The sentence to which we alluded was this: "The only operating agent in Nature recognized by the evolution philosophy is molecular energy." We did not overlook the succeeding parts of his essay, but meant to point out that this sentence is in direct contradiction of them. The only way to escape this contradiction is to maintain that "energy" can be at the same time a mere "word" and also an "operating agent in Nature." Mr. Lum will hardly be so bold as to maintain that. No mere "word" can be an "operating agent in Nature"; and to refer us to passages in which molecular energy is declared to be a mere "word" is not to explain away the contradiction between them and this other passage in which molecular energy is declared to be an "operating energy in Nature." When Mr. Lum wrote this sentence, he unconsciously but evidently had in his mind a conception of "energy" as something objective in Nature, not subjective in thought—something more than a mere "word." And that is precisely what the scientific theist contends for.—Ed.]

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory results—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Proceedings of Eighth Annual Meeting, 1875. 35 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains Essays by Wm. C. Gannett, on "The Present Constructive Tendencies in Religion," and by Francis E. Abbot, on "Construction and Destruction in Religion," and addresses by T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Chas. G. Ames, O. B. Frothingham, E. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, and E. S. Morse.

Proceedings of Ninth Annual Meeting, 1876. 40 cents. (Four or more, 25 cents each.) Contains a full abstract of the interesting discussion at the Business Meeting on the Practical Methods and Work of the Association; the annual report of the Executive Committee; address of the President, O. B. Frothingham; essay by James Parton, on "The Relation of Religion to the State" (or, as he styles it, "Cathedrals and Beer"), with addresses on the subject by Miss Susan H. Wixon and Rev. M. J. Savage; essay by Samuel Longfellow, on "The Relation of Free Religion to Churches," with the addresses that followed it by Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. Henry Blanchard, Rev. Brooke Herford, and John Weiss,—together with letters from Judge Doe, Rev. Joseph Cook, and others, invited to speak.

Religions of China, by Wm. H. Channing. 25 cents.

Reason and Revelation, by William J. Potter. 10 cents.

Taxation of Church Property, by Jas. Parton. 5 cents, singly; package of ten, 30 cents; of one hundred, $1.50.

These publications are for sale at the office of the Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston. The Annual Reports for 1868 and 1871 cannot be supplied, and the supply of others previous to that of 1872 is quite limited. Orders by mail may be addressed either "Free Religious Association, 231 Washington Street, Boston," or to the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. The name, with address in full, must be accompanied with the money in each case.

The new Liberal League Tract of 24 pages, entitled,

"PATRIOTIC ADDRESS,"

contains:

1. PATRIOTIC ADDRESS of the National Liberal League to the people of the United States.
2. CHIEF RESOLUTIONS of the League.
3. PROTEST of the League against shutting the International Exhibition on Sundays.
4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER,

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient co-operation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1876.

WHOLE No. 861.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unfit for Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practicing the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

It is reported that seven thousand persons were present at Mr. Moody's first service in Chicago.

THE AMHERST Student relates this anecdote: "Two seniors, diligently poring over Plato's Apology, met the sentence, 'To fear death is nothing else than to seem to be wise when you are not.' First senior (inquiringly): 'What does that mean?' Second senior (thoughtfully): 'Well, I don't see; but we had better not fool with it, for it may lead to Pantheism for all we know. Let's go on.'"

BY SOME FREAK of Fortune, a circular "Call for a Christian Convention, to be held in the Tabernacle, Chicago, Nov. 21st, 22d, 23d, 1876," has been addressed to us by the Executive Committee and duly received. It seems that the "Pastors of Chicago" consider us a "Reverend and Dear Sir." Far be it from us to suggest that "somebody blundered"; yet, if we should accept the polite attentions of the Committee and present ourselves at the place and time appointed, to be deadheaded through the Convention, we fear that conclusion would be forced upon us. On the whole, we will stay at home.

LAST SUNDAY a meeting was held at the Parker Memorial Meeting-House to consider whether Theodore Parker's old society, the Twenty-Eighth Congregational, should disband and surrender the building. To save the latter, it was necessary to raise $20,000 additional stock, of which $4200 still remained unsubscribed. This latter sum was raised on the spot, with great earnestness of spirit; and so all thought of disbanding was triumphantly dismissed. Every liberal will congratulate the Society, and the public too, on this happy termination of financial embarrassments caused by the long-continued commercial depression. May greatly increased usefulness and prosperity attend the Society from this day forward!

THE REACTION in favor of increased rigor of "Sabbath" observance extends to the Dominion of Canada. A letter from the Minister of Public Works, dated Ottawa, Oct. 4, in reply to resolutions of the Baptist Convention of Nova Scotia, states that orders have been "issued on no account to permit any special train to be run on the Sabbath day, except in case of great emergency, and then only on direct order from the government. Similar instructions were given that no freight trains were to be run on that day, and that no passenger trains should perform their journeys. The only encroachment on the Sabbath will be that of through trains from Quebec reaching their destinations at Halifax and St. John respectively, early on the Sabbath morning." Harper's Weekly makes this significant Sabbatarian comment: "These orders, if carried out, will put the government of Canada in advance of any other in the observance of the Christian day of rest by the State."

THE "Sunday Observance Convention" of the Free Religious Association was held as announced last week. The Essays were of an unusually practical and valuable character, and we are very glad to be enabled to promise the publication of them in THE INDEX, beginning with next week. Colonel Higginson presided at the forenoon and afternoon sessions, and Mr. Potter at the evening session. The audiences were respectable in point of number, if not large; and the reports of the meetings in the daily papers had the effect of enlarging the audiences immensely. Similar conventions ought to be held everywhere for the education of public opinion, and they will be by and by, when Liberal Leagues are multiplied sufficiently. For this was strictly Liberal League work as far as it went—the only difference being that a vigorous Liberal League would have at once initiated a practical movement to carry out the principles so ably advocated by the Essayists.

THIS IS what the New York Observer says of "The Religions of Harvard": "The governing boards, its corporation, its overseers, its professors, are composed of men of most diverse views regarding religion, Christianity, theology, and philosophy. Mr. Emerson, for instance, comes down from Concord on a Wednesday morning to a meeting of the overseers to oppose Mr. Cabot's motion for the discontinuance of morning prayers; and Phillips Brooks, with his usual impetuosity, throws a good deal of striking common sense into the philosophy of the 'Concord dreamer.' James Freeman Clarke's protest against the movement for the abolition of required attendance at church is ably seconded by his Orthodox brother, the Rev. Alexander McKenzie, and is supported by his legal brother of Episcopal affinities, R. H. Dana, Jr. The Adamsons and the Hoars, the Sewalls and the Wymans, the Parkmans and the Thayers,—these and other gentlemen of as dissimilar opinions regarding religion, compose the governing bodies of the University. The hundred professors and tutors exhibit the similar varieties. Dr. Peabody, honored alike by Unitarians and the Congregationalists, sits in faculty meetings by the side of his brother professor of rather liberal tendencies, James Russell Lowell. Prof. Asa Gray, Benjamin Pierce, and Prof. Palmer, a graduate of Andover, are colleagues of Charles Eliot Norton, Prof. Henry Adams (editor of the North American Review), and Prof. Sophocles, who is as filial to his Greek religion as he is to his Greek tongue. Fourteen per cent. of the students at Harvard are Unitarians, twelve per cent. Congregationalists, and between eleven and twelve per cent. are Episcopalians. Considering the Congregationalists, the Episcopalians, the Methodists, the Baptists, the Lutherans, and him whose 'religious preference' 'Christianity alone expresses,' as belonging to Evangelical denominations, we find that about thirty per cent. of the students have Evangelical views regarding religion, which is double the number of those of Unitarian tendencies. Both Unitarians and Evangelical men are together equal to those who have no preference in religion; since most of those 'not heard from' would have reported that they had none. Judged by the proportions in the last class graduated at Yale, thirty-four per cent. of the students have Congregational preferences, sixteen Episcopal, thirteen Presbyterian, three Baptist, two Methodist, and about sixteen per cent. have neither religion nor denominational preferences. Quakers, Universalists, Jews, Catholics, Pantheists, and Deists make up the remainder."

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The Essential Piety of Modern Science.

AN ADDRESS READ BEFORE THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, HELD AT SARATOGA, SEPT. 12-15, 1876.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

We all know that man was not the earth's first occupant; we all know that he did not move in as soon as the plaster was dry; that the duration of his earthly career is only the smallest fraction of the earth's duration as a separate orb. Prof. Dana tells us that the coral-reefs of Florida have all been built in modern times, and he assigns a period of one hundred and ninety-two thousand years for their formation. If modern times go back so far, what can be the limit of the mediæval times or the ancient? Sir William Thomson is a very learned but somewhat conservative geologist, and his conclusion is that the geological history of the earth, as showing continuity of life, must be limited to one hundred million years! But what is such a period as this to the time that must have preceded for the evolution of the solar system from a single mass, and then far back of that for the evolution of all the stars that make the nightly heavens sparkle with so many points of flame! "We shall have time enough in eternity," said Newman Hall to Dr. Cuyler, in the course of a very busy day. "We have eternity enough in time" is the reflection that is suggested by the revelations of astronomy and geology.

There are those who assure us that all of these things harmonize very readily with the cosmology of Genesis. The six days mean six periods of almost infinite duration. Why not? Why but that such an explanation never occurred to any one till the fact had been established by the patient labors of a multitude of scientific men? The sun of truth had not merely peeped above the horizon, it was well up towards its meridian splendor, ere theology gathered her courtiers about her, and in her most dignified and impressive manner said, "Now rise."

The astronomer's telescope, together with his calculations, and the geologist's hammer, similarly aided, have done wonders for us all. They have revealed the macrocosmic side of things, their largeness, their immensity, their vast relations both of time and space. But all this would not particularly impress us if the average make of things was not in keeping with their size, in keeping, too, with the immensities of time consumed in the making of them. It is only natural for a cultivated mind to resent any attempt to overpower it with mere size and weight and a colossal heap of years:—

"In small proportions we just beauties see,
 And in short measures life may perfect be."

Nothing is stupider than the Brahminical chronology. Archbishop Usher's is respectable compared with it. But all the marvellous extensions of our conceptions of the universe in time and space revealed to us by modern science are full as they can hold of microscopic wonders and perfections. The revelations of the microscope, and crucible, and all the various appliances of chemical analysis and synthesis have revealed to us the microcosmic side of things. And this side, seen by itself, is more impressive than the other. The infinitely small appeals to us as the infinitely great does not, not because it is so small, but because, for all its smallness, it is so wonderful in its construction. My friend will magnify a diatom scarcely visible to the naked eye, and you might mistake his photograph of it for a photograph of a superb rose-window of Strasburg or Cologne, until you saw it was a hundred times more exquisite in its construction. It is only when the times and spaces of a Herschel or a Proctor are conceived of as having all their vastness packed with the wonders which the chemist and the entomologist reveal that we begin to realize that, thanks to modern science, a new heaven overarches us, a new earth is spread beneath our feet, and that

"Still the new transcends the old
 In signs and tokens manifold."

But there is one revelation of science which includes all the revelations of longer time and vaster space, and new relations, and such nicety in the make of every animate tissue or inanimate substance as was never dreamed of till our day,—there is one revelation that includes all these particular revelations and a hundred more. It is the revelation of law. The supernaturalist theologian has done his best to check the progress of this revelation, but it has gone on conquering and to conquer. The less law the more God, has been the theological assumption. The perplexities of science have been the consolations of faith. With every new extension of the domain of law, faith has felt its privileges curtailed, its rights invaded. And still the dreaded process has gone forward with remorseless step. The number of recognized connections of phenomena is being every day increased. A few years ago the theologian could still pray for rain, and now his smallest children interrupt his morning grace to ask him for the probabilities. The rain, too, hath a father*—is no illegitimate child. "And, manifestly, as fast as the class of ungeneralized relations becomes smaller, the probability that there may be among them some that do not conform to law becomes less."† It will moreover be seen that there is a law in the discovery of law, that the directions in which universality of law is not yet established are those in which its establishment must necessarily be latest. The more abstract the material, the later the discovery of its law.

The last word of science is unity. This is the revelation of the spectroscopic, showing with cumulative evidence that the chemical constituents of the sun and of the stars are the same as those of our own planet. Ay, the discovery of unknown constituents in the sun and stars has led to the discovery of the same constituents in the stuff the earth is made of. And this same teaching comes to us in the majestic doctrine of the correlation and conservation of forces, in every broader generalization of the vegetable and animal world, in the researches of the historian and the philologist, and last, but not least, in the investigations of comparative religion. The march of unity, like that of law, has left the ruin of many a theological fiction and conceit to mark the line of its advance. But the ban of heresy has been no match for the fascinations of the enterprise.

Such are, in brief, and stated meagrely enough, some of the more prominent conclusions to which modern science has attained. Can we affirm the essential piety of these conclusions? remembering that piety is man's sense of his relation to and his dependence on the infinite, informing Life of everything that is, for which we have, and need to have, no better name than God. Yes, verily, we can. For if the tiny world of ancient thought demanded such a Life as its original source, the world that science has revealed demands it all the more; demands a deeper, purer source, a fountain far more inexhaustible. If chance and miracle did not exclude him, the reign of law bespeaks his constant, immanent activity. And all the unities of nature and of life lead up to his eternal unity:—

"One God, one law, one element,
 And one far-off divine event,
 To which the whole creation moves."

As the white light of Nature can be decomposed into the different colors of the solar spectrum, so the white light of piety can be decomposed into its constituent elements of awe and wonder, admiration, reverence, adoration, thankfulness, the sense of power, the sense of infinity, humility, and trust, and loyalty. What one of all these sentiments is not ennobled and exalted by the results of scientific study and investigation? Is not implied in these results? Is not as essential to them as freshness to the spring-time or as fragrance to the rose? "The more thou searchest, the more thou shalt wonder." The Scripture is apocryphal, but truer word was never spoken. The more thou shalt wonder, not only at the discoveries thou makest—the symmetries, the harmonies, the marvellousness, the beauty of them,—but also at the undiscovered deep which underlies all possible discoveries. Never at any time since man began to think has there been less danger than there is at the present time of men's imagining that they have found out all the secrets of the universe. "Lo, these are parts of his ways, but how little is yet known of him!" The modern scientist can say that with a deeper feeling and a tenderer accent than could the ancient seer. If David could come back to us and, to so much knowledge of the heavens as came to him as he was tending his father's sheep, could add all that our Newtons and Laplaces, our Herschels, Bunsens, and Lockyers know, would he, think you, wish to retract one word in which his awe and wonder, reverence and adoration, found expression eight-and-twenty centuries ago? Nay, more than ever would he feel that "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork"; that "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein." And what accession must the sense of power receive from the teachings of the modern scientist, what accession, too, the sense of God's infinity! The names we give to him are no measure of the sentiments that stir within our breasts. Men have always called him good, and in the next breath have ascribed to him thoughts and actions that would disgrace a highway-robber or the imaginary evil one himself. Words do not generate feeling. It takes ideas, it takes processes of thought, it takes experience, to do this. Of course no number of finites can by any process of addition or multiplication make an infinite, but the universe of modern science has a practical infinitude that is more fruitful of the sense of infinite and eternal things than all the demonstrations of a metaphysical infinity that can be heaped together. Whose heart ever burned within him, by the way, when told that God must be infinite because he is a perfect being and infinity is an attribute of perfection, or because the finite implies the infinite? But whose heart does not leap up, as ne'er did theirs who listened to the Corymbic mysteries, as he attempts to follow the scientific teachers of the day along the path of their sublime interpretations of the practical infinitudes of time and space and the infinite nicety of adaptation?

But awe and wonder, reverence and adoration, are not the only sentiments that are inseparable from any tolerable appreciation of the results of scientific thought. That genuine humility, which has no more in common with the self-contempt of camp-meetings and revivals than with the conceit they nourish that the whole universe was constructed for the scene of man's redemption, may well be nourished by the scientific revelation of the relation of our tiny planet to all the starry host. The conceit that our little planet is the moral centre of the universe ought to have been exploded with the conceit that it is the astronomic centre. But it has outlived that notion now more than two centuries. And still I think it cannot long resist the cumulative evidence that rebukes a feeling so absurd and arrogant. Jupiter and Saturn may be incandescent, Mars may no longer house a race of men among its frosted mountains, there may be no man in the moon, and many another star and planet may be destitute of any life that corresponds to ours; but if this life of ours is the great thing we dare believe it is, then is it monstrously conceited to imagine that there are not thousands of worlds drifting across those awful spaces—nay, not one of them drifting, but sailing all, steered by a hand divine,—peopled with life as eager as our own. With every fresh discovery of the astronomer we can say with deeper pathos and with more profound humility, "When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and stars which thou has ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him?"

But is there anything in modern science that assists the sentiment of trust, of all the forms of piety the most significant, anything that reinvigorates this sentiment? There is, indeed; and, what is more, this gracious sentiment inheres in that assurance born of the scientific spirit, which has been held to be its deadly enemy; namely, in the invariability of law. Yes, law that has been so dreaded, so maligned, whose conquests have always been greeted with anathemas, whose gains have always been considered so much lost to God, that has been made the antithesis of will and Deity,—law is now, and always has been, "the confidence of all the ends of the earth." "Oh! that thou wouldst rend the heavens, and come down!" has been the cry of all the generations. "Oh! for some miracle, some break in the established order, to convince us that Thou art!" And all the time, the source of so much peace as men have had has been the invariable sequence of events. Because of this, we have always known where to find God. We have known what to expect, what to anticipate. We talk about the cruelty of law because it never steps aside, "freezes a man like an apple," distinguishes not between saint and sinner. This is not cruelty. This is education. It would be cruel if the law should swerve, if it were an unstable quantity. The suspicion of such a thing would paralyze all human effort. We should neither plant nor build. What we call mercy is no afterthought of Deity; it is the constitution of the universe. Other than law, there is no name given under heaven by which men can be saved from ignorance and helplessness. It is the everlasting faithfulness. God's providence is universal. In man only it is specialized. And law is that which makes it possible for man to foresee and so prevent disaster; foresee and so prepare for victory. All special providence is human, and the condition of its ever-widening development is the invariability of law.

But because the special providence is human it is not therefore any less divine. God's arm is not shortened that he cannot save because there is man here at this hither end of his almighty finger-tip. There is not less of the infinite life in our humanity than in the lower forms of Nature; nay, but infinitely more. That word of Jesus, "I and my father are one," was not the announcement of a solitary exception, but of a constant, an invariable unity. Had he but known it, the man Judas also could have said it. The equator is an ideal line, say the geographers. The line between the human and divine is not so much as that. Or if it is,—

"Draw, if thou canst, the mystic line
Rightly severing His from thine,
Which is human, which divine."

Did I call trust the most significant of all the forms of piety? And so it is of piety distinguished from morality. But was not loyalty one of the constituent elements into which we decomposed the white light of piety,—the violet of the spectrum, its most tender hue, or shall we rather say the red, the ruddiest, the tint of blood, of life? And loyalty is but a finer word for "mere morality." No, not exactly. Morality is the sense of social obligation, of obligation between man and man. If in its last analysis it bears a flower of piety, it is because "the power not ourselves" is an eternal power; not merely the social push, but a push behind society and antecedent to it,—the earnest expectation of the creation longing for the manifestation of the sons of God. But at its best, starting from the morality side, morality does not include the whole of piety. But, starting from the side of piety, this includes the whole of morality. Love, loyalty, is the fulfilling of the law. Let a man's heart really quicken with those sentiments of awe and wonder, gratitude and trust, which are so deeply implicated in the scientific rendering of the universe, and how can he help desiring, longing, steadfastly resolving to give himself in earnest service that of Infinite Power whose manifestations have awakened in him all these sentiments? So piety becomes enthusiasm for humanity. The one Life is in everything. There is nothing without it; nothing without its power, its wisdom; nothing without its goodness. The power, the wisdom, and the goodness are not outside the universe, outside the laws, outside the daily tasks, outside the men and women, outside the cares, and crosses, and calamities, but in all these forever. And all things are for every one. Leave out one man or woman, leave out one flower or star, leave out one struggle, sorrow, victory, of all the past, and you and I should not be what we are to-day. All the pasts help us; all the futures beckon us. And now what is the natural, the inevitable, response of any earnest heart that knows and feels all this; that all is so for each; that One, the Infinite, is so for all? What can it be but, Each for all, each for the Infinite One? And this is loyalty. Freely ye have received, freely give. So grandly helped, we long to help in turn. But how? We cannot make the sun any brighter, or the sky any bluer, or the ocean or the mountains any more sublime. Here and there we can make the earth a little greener, fairer; perhaps make such a flower to bloom as God, in all his everlastingness, has never seen before. But this is not enough. We must do more than this. And the way is always clear; the gate is always open. It is to lend a hand, to do what in us lies to make life happier, sweeter, brighter, pleasanter, holier, diviner, for those with whom we mingle in the various activities of life and love. This is practical piety, and it is the essential piety of modern scientific thought.

This piety is sometimes very stern and exigent. Sometimes demands it great things of us; not less than that we say sometimes, "Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him," trust that he does not do it willingly, trust that he only slays because it is best for all, and so best for us, that he should slay, and, trusting so, take sides with him against ourselves, and be willing in a new sense, but in a vastly higher than the old, to be damned for his glory, condemned to suffer grievous loss and pain, rather than that the everlasting laws which are his glory should swerve or bend in any least degree to suit our dearest plan, our sweetest hope, our tenderest delight, our fondest expectation.

"Thy various messengers employ,
Thy purposes of love fulfill;
And 'mid the wreck of human joy,
Let kneeling faith adore thy will."

But let us do full justice to the terror that has been excited in religious minds by recent scientific speculations. It is no longer the astronomer, or the geologist, who excites the most alarm. It is the biologist, the evolutionist; not Herschel and Thomson, but Darwin and Spencer. I have said that these names stand as yet for scientific tendencies, rather than for scientific results. I say this in no spirit of disparagement. In saying it, my wish is not the father of my thought. On the contrary, Spencer's whole doctrine of evolution and Darwin's special illustration of it seem to me so intrinsically grand and beautiful, and so harmonious with all we do know of the make of things, that I am obliged to be continually upon my guard, lest I accept them because I want to, instead of because they have been proved beyond a doubt. But what if they should thus be proved? Is it inconceivable that piety should inhere in such results? I cannot think so. I can find nothing in them that dishonors either God or man. I find that which honors both; God, by exhibiting the ordered beauty of his operation; man, by suggesting for him a development in the future proportioned to his development through an illimitable past. I find nothing but new proofs, and grander, more suggestive, more poetic, than any known before, of the ONE in all and of the all in each, and new sanctions for the law that each shall be for all; all things so working together for us, and ONE in all, that we are honor-bound to perfect loyalty of thought, and word, and deed to all, and in, and through, and over all, to the eternal ONE. I dare not long that anything not clearly seen to be the truth may be the truth, remembering who it was that said, "My judgment is just, because I seek not mine own will." But if I dared, then I would long with a great longing that these speculations, which men stand in fear and terror of, might be established on irrefragable foundations.

At the same time, there is a doctrine of evolution abroad of which to predicate essential piety would be manifestly absurd. It is a doctrine which suggests that out of mere dead matter came all the present bounty, and wonder, and delight of this most glorious universe, "the Lord Christ's heart and Plato's brain," and all the wisdom, and the love, and the joy that ever made it good to be alive. But of mere dead matter who has ever yet discovered the first atom, not with the eye of sense, but with the keenest intellectual vision? Wherever we find matter, it is not dead, but alive; alive with order, and tendency, and purpose. Even Büchner, the most redoubtable of all materialists, must allow that his dead matter has a tendency to combine. To allow that is to allow everything. But why be frightened so by this matter, when no man knows, or ever can know, what matter is? All we are certain of is mind, is consciousness. Extension, hardness, these do not inhere in matter. These are but forms of consciousness affected by we know not what.

Any doctrine of evolution that does not affirm a first term of the series, a spiritual term, which then and there, at the imaginary beginning, was in itself more than all that has ever since been evolved from it, from Him, is a self-evident absurdity. The laws of thought demand an infinite element in every step of evolution. Evolution of a higher by a lower is unthinkable. Evolution of a higher from a lower presupposes, antecedent to the lower, a higher than the highest term of the ascending series. For that higher than the highest we have, and need to have, no better name than God. Nothing better can come out of it, of him, than was in him in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be,—if not thought, then something better; if not love, then something better. But is he conscious of our awe and wonder, our adoration and thanksgiving, our trust in him, our heart-felt loyalty? "No consciousness without vibration," say the mental physiologists. And yet, right here in ourselves, where we are absolutely certain of the consciousness, it eludes all chemical and microscopic tests. It may, then, well do so in the universe, and the converse of the proposition, No vibration without consciousness, may bespeak a Heart of things that can rejoice in us as consciously as we rejoice in Him. But if not consciousness, then something better.

What expression is there of the piety of by-gone times that does not stagger, as it never did before under its weight of meaning, when we attempt to make it bear the weight of this new piety which is essential to our modern scientific thought? Not as exact expressions, but as symbols, we may still retain the words of psalm and prophecy, still take them joyfully and tenderly upon our lips,—but they are all inadequate. The awe, the reverence, the thankfulness, the trust, the loyalty, are more than such, or any, words can tell. Let the new poets sing them ever so sweetly, let the new prophets preach them ever so grandly, the unspeakable cannot be spoken. Only a life devoted to all highest purposes and tenderest benefactions, only a life of absolute justice, and sincerity, and truth, and love, can adequately give expression to our sense of the ineffable sweetness and benignity of that relation which exists between the soul of man and the Eternal God.

CHURCH AND STATE.

DEFINITIONS.

What is the State? There are many answers to this question, depending on the particular aspect in which we view the subject. It is the organic function of the instinct of nationality; it is an association for mutual protection; it is the resultant motion of conflicting personal ambitions; government is in part positive expression of the popular will, and in greater part a complement of individual or class assumption filling the vacuum left by popular passiveness and lack of will. But the most practical and important aspect of government is this: An association of property-holders or possessors of the material means of life, having for object the retention and increase of their possessions and of the advantages which those who have possess over those who want. There is no other definition of government so complete as to say: "Government is the agency of capital." Nearly all legislation is for the direct purpose of protecting the possessors of wealth in their possessions. Most of the legislation protective of life and liberty is possible only by giving life and liberty an estimated money-value. If money rather than manhood controls the government, it is the fault of manhood, not of money. Wealth has its natural weight, inseparable from it as gravitation from the idea of matter. If the ballots of the multitudes of laborers, possessors mainly of muscles and stomachs, avail little against the will of the manufacturing or transportation monopolists, why, all that can be said is, that this is the necessary penalty which the laborers pay for having permitted others to reap vast fortunes from their labors. To cure the ills of the toiler, to invigorate the vote, to make the government the exponent of popular strength instead of the counterpart of popular impotence, this is not to be effected by additional legislation, for legislation is unpreventably in the interest of wealth; it is only by union, coöperation, and by understanding and managing their own affairs,—by making themselves capable to manage them,—that the laborers can retain in their own possession the fruits of their labors, and reduce overgrown individual estates, dangerous monopolies, and corrupt governments to healthy proportions.

WHAT IS THE CHURCH?

That side of it which we have to do with here may be described as organized association for the better satisfaction of the religious instinct. What is religion? This is a question too vast to be discussed here, and in fact no two men agree on precisely the same answer to it. Like all motor forces of human nature, religion grows from roots that reach down into an obscurity that is impenetrable to the intellect; but however shapeless, indeterminate, and indescribable, it nevertheless animates some very positive and apparent institutions. Most of these are summed up in the word "Church." Government is the recognition of the hard, hateful, undodgeable facts of existence; the Church is the asylum of the ideal, the focus of dreams confessed too bright for this world, and therefore postponed in their realization to the world beyond the skies. The beautiful and beneficent side of religious institutionalism it would be useless to deny; but it has also a very repulsive and anti-human side. No one can deny that, in practice, religion (the necessity of love and reverence), like government (the necessity of order and centrality), is made use of by its ministrants for the enslavement of the masses. They who are deputized to officiate at the altar, or in any of the many branches of over-government, are steadily taught by the nature of their functions to forget that they are the servants of the people, and to acquire the habit of looking at the people as a flock, which they are willing to direct and shear, but not to pasture. In practice, law is the grip of the strong on the weak, and religion is the sanctification of power.

CHURCH AND STATE NATURAL AND INDISSOLUBLE ALLIES.

Any community that has not grown beyond the need of a government has not grown beyond the need of a Church. The more Church the more government; the more government the more Church. Both flourish in proportion to the general faith in institutionalism as a remedy for natural ills. The anti-popular tendency in each is a link which neither has yet been able to break. A successful administration never lacks the support of Orthodoxy. When capital decrees and can enforce the absolute slavery of the working classes, Orthodoxy is ever ready to quote God in support of masters' rights; when capital finds it politic to decree modified or wage-slavery, Orthodoxy abandons the old doctrines with well-timed agility. The Church is the agency that the State uses to make the slaves believe their condition equitable and God-appointed.

In short, Church and State exist to legitimize and justify success—whatever has power to arise and stand—and to condemn failure; to give to him that hath much and take away from him that hath little. Although this seems to be the natural, necessary way of the world, still there are those who inhabit a level of thought (and action?) far removed from this on which Church and State agree so well.

The principal dissensions between Church and State arise over the division of the spoils, and over the question who shall be greatest. On the point of popular subjection they are always agreed. In point of moral elevation there is rarely any great difference between the priest and legislator of the epoch. No form of oppression, however monstrous and blood-stained, but has had the seal of divine right set upon it by the prevailing religious sentiment of its epoch. True, there is always a very small minority of rebels against force and fashion, but they cannot be said to represent the prevailing religious sentiment of any age. We will neither complain of these facts nor deny them.

The merits of Church and State need no advocacy; they are apparent; they have facts, the past, the overwhelming chorus of salaried pettifoggers, the majority of bayonets to back them. Why fear to admit that, like all other human institutions, they have also a wrong side? To the strong, the successful, the State is a cherishing mother; to the weak and unfortunate it is a relentless pressure sinking them into the bloody mire. To the docile, the mediocre, the fortunate inmates of mildly-tempered clay, the easily-satisfied, the temple may be a heaven on earth; but to many, original in thought and sentiment, incapable of obedience to conventionalisms however beneficent, it may be the abhorred plague-spot of the universe. Those find their happiness in the bosom of the Church who carry it there with them.

DESTRUCTIVE ASPECT OF REFORM.

The human mind, in its earlier efforts to comprehend its relations to Nature and humanity, makes use of hypothetical constructions which, by a further advance in thought, are discovered to be premature and imperfect. Belief may be defined as provisional knowledge (though this is not the whole of belief), and the developing mind is constantly finding itself forced to leave behind the form, if not the essence, of its most cherished faiths. The attachment to old ideas which have become a part of our life, moulded our speech, allied themselves almost inextricably with our sentiments and affections, is strong in all, and strong enough in most of our species to give a hateful look to all reform. For reform is necessarily destructive; it is a revision of the accepted limitations of human knowledge, and this is the self-contradiction of science that all veritable increase of it implies a reduction of its formal pretensions. Science consists as much in finding out what may not be known as in positive cognition. The more rudimentary the state of the individual or race, the greater the faith in the mind's power to extend the realm of the known. The more acute and positive the perception of the world around us, the livelier is the sense of the barriers of the unknowable, and the less value we attach to the early faiths that comprehend everything and explain nothing.

That augmentation of the positiveness and certainty of knowledge is always attended by circumscription of its claims to formal comprehensiveness (a process akin to the condensation of nebulous chaos into habitable globes) needs no proof. Historical illustrations of the fact would be tedious, and the reader can supply them for himself. The less the real knowledge of mind and matter in any age, the more likely is it to be used as the stock of a tyrannical monopoly,—on the principle that the less of any commodity in the market, the easier to get up a "corner."

The shape that the most valuable reforms present to the popular eye is that of mischievous destructiveness. What is built may be mostly secret mental processes; what is displaced is institutions, establishments, visible, tangible facts. The venerable dungeon walls are something solid; but the viewless freedom of the air, what is that? Who reck of it? Only those newly deprived of it!

Most real reforms in government consist in repeal, abolition, removing the swaddling-bands of the infant, or knocking off the fetters that the slave, waking to a consciousness of his strength, refuses longer to wear. True reform in the relations of Church and State is very simple; it is to abolish State interference with natural religious (or irreligious) liberty. Equal rights before the law—all the liberty that is compatible with the equal liberty of all others,—that is the most, and least, that any one can demand.

THE TWIN FORCES OF SOCIETY.

Society polarizes itself to our view into two forces which divide it into hostile camps,—the possessors and the wanters; held, for the most part, from overt war by the numerous middle class whose interests take hold on both possession and want. Conservative and radical; Orthodox and heterodox; rich and poor; old and young,—names of these opposites are legion, and, like all names, avail little. The conflict between these opposed tendencies, which, for convenience' sake, we may call conservative and radical, is eternal and omnipresent. It is neither possible nor needful to make a logic-proof statement of their relations. One side is labor, love, fecundity, want, discontent, disorder, ignorance, slavery; the other is freedom from toil and want, content with the actual, hatred of nascent humanity, repression of wild, popular instincts, order, mastership. The desire to gain life, liberty, happiness, everything—the desire to preserve that which has already been gained,—these two motives, identical at bottom, redeem the world from stagnation. Most men are made radical or conservative by their condition in life forcing upon them one policy or the other,—either of assaulting the bars that shut them from the objects of their natural desires, or maintaining the institutions that protect them in the enjoyment of their inherited or acquired advantages over their fellows.

The aim of the radical, which he never expects to reach, is anarchy, the reign of love and the death of the ancient necessity for laws and weapon-bearing institutions; the aim of the conservative, which is constantly growing more indistinct in the darkness of the past, is the subordination of the blind, genial, destructive impulses of the many to the greatest good of the least number.

UNITY.

The foundations of existence are deeply, darkly laid; justice is cruel; all soils are sterile till fertilized by carnage; goodness has its terrors; holiness covers a skeleton of relentless austerity; prudence and order are backed by rod and sword; love's flower springs from the black depths of lust; beauty is a bewildering exhalation that stirs itself over the face of chaos. Whether we call all good, or evil, matters little. The universal movements wait not upon our approbation. All things are bound together in a chain which man has not forged and cannot sever; all lines leading in opposite directions curve around to meet at their extremes, and the inviolable wholeness of the universe ever thwarts our attempts at segregation or partisanship. One-sidedness cannot endure, but runs at last into the arms of its antipode. All whirls and turns, and seeks its balance forever, in exact confusion.

The radical is beholden to conservatism for the stern centripetal grasp that prevents his nebulous aspirations from exploding the world in ruin; the conservative, hugging close his fact, would petrify all in a living death but for the all-creating, all-destroying inventiveness of radicalism. Burn all, oxygen! Resist all, nitrogen! Corrosion is death, stagnation is death, and their warlike union is all life.

To rear, repair, and enlarge the social edifice needs all sorts of workers. No one but contributes something, but often not according to his intention. All is collision and conflict, issuing in a grand harmony. The enemies of society, they who would lay all in ruins, by their attempts thereto only confirm and consolidate it; they make necessary stricter laws and sterner procedures than would otherwise be needed. The other extreme, the friends of society, the communists, they who would identify all interests and make society mean everything, by their humanitarian, anti-selfish teachings loosen the bonds of a force-cemented society, and by their illumination of that profound fatality, universal brotherhood, make peace, instead of war, the instinct and policy of the masses, and thus make property more secure and promote the growth of plutocracy.

The Tree of Life stands strong and fair in eternal verdure; its leaves flutter in the clear sky where all is light and gladness; its roots reach down into sadness and obscurity. Strike at the ever-budding growths with the sword of law and order, ye dwellers in the top-most branches! Hew them into some theoretic pattern! Vain, vain forever is your aim and indispensable your efforts. And ye, proletarian myriads, despised toiling rabble, choke its roots with nutrient filth, water them with your hearts' blood that the senseless sand drinks, and secret tears of defeat falling into darkness and oblivion! Blind love working on millions the primal woe of birth, blind hatred with its beneficent pruning out of the inefficient,—the ineradicable dualism of passion, shall broder eternally on the infinite album, Time and Space, beautiful, grotesque, and horrible figments, and that which strives to be shall jostle that which is.

THE SCIENCE OF UNIVERSOLOGY.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

I took pains in a preliminary article (INDEX, Oct. 26) to show that sciento-philosophy is neither Metaphysics properly so called, or as heretofore understood, nor Physics in that broadest sense in which it contrasts with Metaphysics,—what Elseberg calls Physology; but that it concerns especially that intermediate region in which the domain of matter is co-terminous with the domain of mind, and where, as it will appear, the laws of matter and the laws of mind are translatable into each other, by means of this betweenness; if, indeed, they be not rather identified as one and the same. More strictly speaking, it is analogic as a direct derivation from mathematics, which, as before shown, is the centring domain of universo-logy. Analogic is, so to say, the metaphysics of physics symbolized in mathematics; and its particulars consist of laws and principles, recurring like an echo in every domain.

All laws and principles whatsoever are derived from, and relate themselves back to, the primal discriminations or first elements of the mathematics; and all classification is derived from those laws and principles.

This identity of the laws and principles of all domains institutes recurring samenesses of distribution everywhere, no matter how diverse the nature of the substances, or things, or domains so distributed—an infinite variety in unity,—all traceable back to definite underlying mathematical origins. To make this matter simple, let me say, referring to the previous article, that, if the total universe is constructed upon the plan there exhibited of having a Without, a Within, and a Between, so each of these universcula, or sub-universes, is in turn constituted upon the same plan, and has its Without, Within, and Between, down to the least possible instance of universo-logical subdivision. Two observations are here called for; first, that the universe, or sub-universe, not merely is so constituted, as if by the fiat of a god, but that it must be so constituted by an inherent necessity; it being inconceivable that it, or anything, should be constituted in any other way since everything, to be anything, must have its Without, its Within, and its Between; and secondly, that from this mode of the constitution of universal things it results that there not merely is, but that there must be UNIVERSAL ANALOGY, from a repetition of the same mode of distribution within the whole, and within each part and part-icular, or little part, down to the least part, within the totality of things. It is this which Swedenborg means when he says that "all things are contained in the least thing"—not all things, strictly, but all laws and principles. In other words, the constitution of a pea embodies all the principles which are embodied in the constitution of the universe. While this statement may not be apprehended or acceded to at once by the reader, in its total largeness, he will at least admit that Outerness, Innerness, and Betweenness of those two are conditions which necessarily affect equally the smallest and the largest things; and that it is, therefore, at least conceivable that whole, part, and least part should be subject, in some sense, to one and the same law of distribution; and also he may be able to perceive that, if such analogy exists, it must be possible by means of it to reason from the minor to the major, reversing the syllogistic which reasons only from major to minor.

Analogic is the science of this identity of law in diversity of spheres. It goes back, for its origin, at least in the direction of largeness, to the primal distribution of the universe into matter, mind, and their intermediation; and of this intermediation into catalogic, (logic, grammar, etc.), mathematics, and analogic, as shown in the preceding article—back therefore to mathematics as the middle of the betweenness of universal things.

Each whole and each part being thus distributed in a like manner, the sameness of distribution between any two parts, or between any parts and the whole, is called analogy. And as everything is characterized by it, this analogy or sameness of law is called Universal Analogy; and the particular parts or members of any two such domains which answer to each other, or fill the similar place, are called analogues of each other. The right understanding of the meaning of these two terms, analogy and analogue, is the key to the science of analogic.

The members in the distribution of any domain whatsoever may be taken as the pattern, and the corresponding members of the other domains be referred to them as analogues; but the mathematical domain is the most simple, determinate, and certain, and within it the geometrical or morphological, which furnishes diagrams or pictures to aid the imagination; whence the fact arises that the mathematical analogies serve best for the secure basis of the new science. It is for this reason that in the previous article I promised to give some idea, specifically, in this, of the nature of this mathematical basis of scientific analogy.

We will dismiss for the moment our former beginning point, in the difference between the Without, the Within, and the Between, returning to it after a little, and take now another beginning point in the difference, in a sense even more primitive than the other (logically speaking), between nothing and something, or what Kant calls negation and reality. Named in this manner, they are metaphysical terms, and neither Kant nor any of his commentators, not even Hegel, who has begun his philosophy at this point, has related them to anything mathematical or realistic.

It will not be difficult to perceive, however, the moment it is mentioned that the zero of mathematics is the mathematical nothing or negation, or the negative factor, department, or member of the mathematical domain; and that one—repeated it may be, as many ones or units—is the mathematical something or reality, or the affirmative factor, department, or member of the general field of mathematics, or of number. And so soon as this objective and obvious alliance is formed between the speculative thought of the great metaphysician and this most common and quasi-objective sphere, the arithmetical sphere, what was before half mystical, and at all events obscure, becomes patent and comprehensible for every grade of intellect.

We have now established analogy between a metaphysical discrimination (negation and reality) and a mathematical discrimination (zero and affirmative numeration),—the metaphysical discrimination being universal, or belonging to no particular sphere (philosophical), and the mathematical discrimination being special, or belonging to the particular domain of number (scientoid); the metaphysical discrimination being, on account of its broad generality, vague, indeterminate, unsatisfactory; and the mathematical discrimination being, by virtue of its speciality, definite, determinate, and satisfactory. It is this kind of terminal conversion into opposites, or beginning at the other end, for the sake of clearness and certainty, this commencement in the analytical details of something which is manageable and familiar, instead of the far-off and universal,—this adoption of the scientific in place of the speculative method, which converts philosophy into sciento-philosophy proper, and founds the science of universo-logy by means of analogic.

Those two great universal principles, permeating all spheres, called negative and positive, take their origin from and revert for elucidation to the commencement of count in the difference between zero and one; and might have been called zero-ish and unit-ish; and all other universal principles whatsoever, I again emphatically aver, take their origin from the simplest of mathematical discriminations.

Kant calls that aspect of universal being which so divides into negative and positive the domain of quality. He then proceeds to the proper domain of quantity, and divides it into one, many, and all. How many persons have ever recognized in these formidable metaphysical aspersions our simple and familiar grammatical distribution of nouns into singular, plural, and collective; or the still more familiar mathematical idea of single, manifold, and compound, as in the one, the manyness, and the sum composed of the one and the many, on the school-boy's slate? But of what practical use is a universal which has no particulars; a broad speculative discrimination which is never brought down into special applications? Who has distinctly perceived that the integration and differentiation of Spencer are no other than the one and many of Kant, in a more specialized form? Here again we are establishing analogies between different spheres, and are recurring, for that purpose, to a simple and primary mathematical distribution. This line of thought is so new and for some so difficult, merely from its newness, that it is better to risk being obscure from brevity than cumbersome from prolixity. Hence I shall make my occasional articles on the subject purposely short.

SUNDAY AT THE CENTENNIAL.

[We are extremely glad to be allowed to publish this thoughtful article even at this late day. It was withheld too long by the modesty of the writer.—ED.]

To a thinking mind the universe itself is the sermon of all sermons. It begins to preach itself to the sprawling babe, and has not done till the stony eye of age closes upon a day as bright as the first. There is nothing for any preacher but to explain microscopically the nearest points of this never-begun, never-ending sermon, and modestly try to assign his hearers to their present places and duties in this infinite, incomprehensible system of things.

Of all human sermons explanatory of the universe and man's place in it, the present Centennial Exhibition seems to me the most solemn and impressive. I cannot conceive why it should be closed on Sunday, except to pour contempt on the Christian Sabbath. Were I a Sabbatarian, in the theological sense of that term, I should insist that of all days in the week the Exhibition should be open on the Sabbath, and closed for the necessary rest of the exhibitors on some other day or days of the week. Suppose a religious pastor desirous to inculcate upon his flock the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in regard to the universe and their relations to it,—here is a field where he may lead them and clinch the instructions of years of previous Sabbaths. Is the Sabbath too good for that?

But supposing he has been busy inculcating views which the great sermon of the Exhibition would not sustain but confute,—then it is conceivable that he might wish to brand the Exhibition as profane, by excluding it from a day which is commonly accounted sacred. Largely secular the Exhibition undoubtedly is; but as long as secular things are allowed to exist and be taken cognizance of on the Sabbath in the pulpit, this cannot be a reason why Sabbatarians object to the opening of the Exhibition on Sunday. The only true reason is that in the Exhibition are a large number of objects which have no secular or commercial, but only a religious bearing. In other words, they tell on certain religious dogmas. If they told favorably, the supporters of these dogmas would think no day too sacred to avail themselves of their powerful aid. They would lead their Sabbath-schools in crowds up to these objects as a holy confirmation of their faith. As it is, the best they can do is to treat the Exhibition as wholly secular, if not profane, and allow their Sabbath-schools to visit it only on secular days, and without any instruction as to the bearing on their sacred history of the relics of prehistoric man.

This dread of absolute truth which has closed the Exhibition on Sunday, in favor of an effete and indefensible dogmatism, has had the pernicious effect of encouraging a set of the most abominable side-shows that ever disgraced Christendom. I do not refer to learned pigs and two-headed calves, but to gambling and drinking-saloons, and theatres for the exhibition of nude vulgarity. All these, with the exception of about two acres and a half of them that were burned up the previous Saturday, right under the eaves of the great Exhibition, were open to some fifty thousand people who, like me, were obliged to remain over Sunday in the neighborhood. This, of course, was their harvest time. But for the exclusion of the crowd from the Exhibition grounds, they could not have existed. Gladly would tens of thousands of that crowd of strangers from the far-off wilds of Arkansas or Minnesota have paid fifty cents for permission simply to walk in the beautiful grounds and examine the multitude of rare plants and flowers outside the buildings. Bigotry, for their accommodation, had hermatically sealed Paradise, but left hell wide open across the street! I cannot say how many of the Sunday-bound strangers patronized the vile nuisances of which I speak, but they were certainly noisy from the inside. O, that it may be otherwise at the next Centennial!

It is not to be supposed that the class of Christians who had shut up the Centennial Exhibition on Sunday could be wholly oblivious of the spiritual interests of the strangers thereabout assembled, like sheep without a shepherd, on that day. As a specimen of what they were about at the Atlas Hotel, where I boarded, I will describe what I saw and heard Sunday evening.

The Atlas Hotel is a vast aggregate of shanties, two stories high, directly opposite the western end of the Exhibition grounds, capable of lodging three thousand people, and feeding as many more as could be persuaded to wait long enough. Its sitting-room, in the midst of which is the hotel office, seems to cover about an acre of ground, with abundant provision of chairs, and tables for writing. On one side is a raised stage or dais, with piano, parlor organ, and reading desk, with a large expanse of settees before it. From this piano, on several previous evenings, some lady volunteers had given us good music. This evening it was announced that religious services would take place, to be conducted by a delegation from the Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia, at half-past seven o'clock. As the delegation was tardy, a young man whose piety much exceeded his musical talent, humbly volunteered to occupy the time by singing, in a very unreviving way, several "revival hymns," accompanying himself on the organ, which is considerably more sacred, though less tolerable, than the piano. The crowd bore it with truly Christian fortitude. At last the delegation, with a vastly business air about them, arrived and took the platform. It consisted of two, whose names I would be glad to record, if I could, but to call them "Moody and Sankey accented" will be enough for practical purposes. The volunteer who had done so much for us seemed about to leave the stage, but at the request of Sankey remained as organist. The bearing of Moody seemed to say: "You all see I am a man of business, and my business here is to bring you all to Christ." He arranged his books at the desk, dropped on his knees, buried his face in his handkerchief, and was probably supposed to be praying silently for half a minute. Then he gave out a hymn, beginning,

"There is a fountain filled with blood, Drawn from Immanuel's veins."

He was particular to urge all present to rise during the singing, which they generally did. This struck me as more polite than politic, for the hymn, though poetical and pious enough, is decidedly immoral, and such as few men would care to sanction in the sense put upon it by the revivalists. Then there was a commendably short, though very impertinent, prayer, and another hymn of the same sort, sung standing. The perfect familiarity with God and Christ which this young sprig of commerce assumed in conducting the devotional exercises was something quite astounding; too great, certainly, to last long. But when he arose and announced his text, Dr. McCosh, had been there, would have shrunk into his shell. He had chosen the words of the woman of Tekoah to King David: "For the king doth speak this thing as one that is faulty, in that the king doth not fetch home again his banished."

The king had pronounced in her favor on her feigned case, and now she had him logically bound to bring back Absalom. So the sinner having admitted the truth of the gospel, this young Philadelphia Christian held him bound to give his heart to Christ that night. The banished Christ must at once be brought back. The vigor with which he handled the analogy reminded me of the way I have seen lumber-men roll logs with a cant-hook. But I could not see that any visible effect was produced. The multitude of logs seemed to occupy the same place, as wooden as ever.

Seriously, in the nineteenth century, this is a little too bad. There are two views widely taken of the literary collection from which this dry-goods clerk took his text. One is that it is exceedingly valuable for its wisdom and venerable for its age, but subject to criticism as any other human production. In this view the curious legend of the woman of Tekoah is not beset with special difficulties, and could not have the remotest relation to Christianity. Another view, taken by the American Bible Society, and expressed by a conspicuous sign on its building in the Centennial grounds, is that the whole collection is "holy"; a revelation, not a word of which is without the inspiration of the Almighty himself. In this view of it a question arises at once as to what divine inspiration meant by this woman of Tekoah, which our Moody No. 2 did not seem at all competent to settle. Joab sends a woman called wise, with a lie in her mouth, to entrap the royal author of the Psalms into a promise to recall Absalom, his favorite son, then a fugitive murderer. She succeeds in obtaining a favorable judgment on her feigned case, and then not only brings it home to the king in our preacher's text, but proceeds immediately to say, as another home-thrust of her argument: "For we must needs die, and are as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again." The royal Psalmist is not recorded as making any reply whatever to this most emphatic denial of any life after death; and the question therefore arises whether divine inspiration does not here teach the mortality of the soul as well as of the body. And if the Bible, in other parts of it, written in later times, teaches a different doctrine, then comes the question, why God in one age should have revealed the mortality of the soul, and in another its immortality. I confess I should much rather listen to Dr. Woolsey, Dr. Bacon, or Dr. McCosh on this particular passage of the oldest of books than to any imitator of Moody. Till such men succeed in answering this question, there must be a rapidly increasing number of our fellow-citizens who, while giving the Bible a place of high honor in the literature of past ages, will regard the Bible Society's sign on the Centennial grounds as a relic of fetishism. Such relics are to be found in the exhibits of all the nations, from the miserable Jerusalem booth for the sale of "holy" trinkets, to an elegant stall in the Main Building, which bears the following frank inscription: "Magaud Frères, 11 Boulevard Sebastopol, Paris, MANUFACTURERS OF BEADS, MEDALS, CHRISTMAS, IVORY, AND LOCKETS." Poor Africa also shows her fetiches, quite as reasonable, in themselves, but seems not like the Christian peoples to offer them for sale. If this traffic in fetiches should flourish another hundred years, probably the next Centennial will also be closed on Sunday, for Sabbath and Bible are worshipped by our exclusionists not only for the use that rational beings can derive from them, but over and above and beyond all that, with exactly the same superstitious feeling which the African has for the "holy thing" which he hangs about his neck. When we have come to see that everything is holy except a wicked soul, we shall be free to use the best day for the deepest look into the wonders of creation and of man.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Oct. 7, 1876.

A DISTINGUISHED lawyer and freethinker of Illinois, while arguing a case before a Chicago Court on the subject of "mandamus," had occasion to refer to a book called Moses on Mandamus. The judge, probably as a joke, asked him to give the exact chapter and verse of Moses. The counsellor replied, "Oh, your Honor misapprehends the reference. I refer to a very good law book; but your Honor has in mind a different book by a different Moses, and I may say also on a different subject. That is a book on God-damus, while the one to which I refer is on Mandamus."

AUTUMN LEAVES.

Gold and crimson and darkest umber,
Rivalling gorgeous sunset rays;
Dyes that olden, barbaric princes
Loved to brighten their festal days.

Russet and green and vivid scarlet
Rustling lay 'neath my eager feet;
As I walked beneath the bannered arches
When Life was young and Love was sweet.

The Wind played glad triumphal marches
To which my heart kept time and tune,
And through the bright autumnal weather
Earth wore for me a look of June.

A decade—and again I'm walking
Adown the old familiar street,
"The flying gold of ruined woodlands"
Bustles and glows beneath my feet.

But Wind among the bannered branches
Plays only funeral dirges low,
For Life hath nothing more to give me,
If Thou and Love together go!

THE OX-TAMER.

BY WALT WHITMAN.

In a far-away northern county, in the placid, pastoral region,
Lives my farmer friend, the theme of my recitative, a famous Tamer of Oxen:
There they bring him the three-year-olds, and the four-year-olds, to break them;
He will take the wildest steer in the world, and break him and tame him;
He will go fearless, without any whip, where the young bullock chafes up and down the yard;
The bullock's head tosses restlessly high in the air, with raging eyes;
Yet, see you! how soon his rage subsides—how soon this Tamer tames him.
See you, on the farms hereabout, a hundred oxen, young and old, and he is the man who has tamed them;
They all know him—all are affectionate to him;
See you! Some are such beautiful animals—so lofty looking!
Some are buff-colored—some mottled—one has a white line running along his back—some are brindled;
Some have wide flaring horns (a good sign). See you the bright hides;
See, the two with stars on their foreheads—see, the round bodies and broad backs;
See, how straight and square they stand on their legs—see, what fine, sagacious eyes;
See, how they watch their Tamer—they wish him near them—how they turn to look after him!
What yearning expression! how uneasy they are when he moves away from them.
—Now I marvel what it can be he appears to them (books, politics, poems depart—all else departs);
I confess I envy only his fascination—my silent, illiterate friend,
Whom a hundred oxen love, there in his life on farms,
In the northern county far, in the placid, pastoral region.

CASH RECEIPTS.

FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 18.

C. L. Newman, $3.10; Miss M. C. Perkins, $10; B. F. Smith, $3.20; G. H. Foster, $1.09; Dr. K. Hoegh, $3.25; Mrs. Underwood, 16 cents; A. W. Withington, $3.20; E. L. Winham, 10 cents; Mrs. M. E. Moore, $1.60; John Traak, $3.20; C. B. LeRow, 75 cents; H. M. Fisher, $3; A. S. Brown, $16.40; C. A. Greenleaf, $3; Lewis G. Jones, $3.20; E. G. Williams, $1.99; T. B. Gunn, $3.98; L. G. Felch, $10; Thomas Mumford, $10; J. W. Chadwick, $13; C. W. Story, $10; N. Littlefield, 10 cents; W. S. Cunningham, $1.35; C. Garrison, $3.25; Mrs. A. J. Van Scooter, $1.60; Laura Barnaby, $6.40; J. E. Curtis, $1.60; Ringgold Record, $1; J. Underhill, $3; P. Heidelberg, $3.20; C. G. Clark, $3.20; Mrs. E. Thompson, $3.20; A. J. Warner, $3.20; Mrs. S. D. Todd, 25 cents; E. F. Haessinger, $3.20; E. Z. Penfield, $5.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

The Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 23, 1876.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

MISS SUSAN B. ANTHONY, the able and popular lecturer, will speak in Investigator Hall, Paine Building, on Sunday evening, Dec. 3. This will be the first of a course of ten Sunday-evening lectures, all of them by women of acknowledged ability.

MR. J. A. J. WILCOX, of Boston, has been duly elected Treasurer of the Index Association, to fill the vacancy in that office caused by the deeply mourned death of Mr. Ranney. Mr. Wilcox is a gentleman highly respected in this city, and was elected last July Treasurer of the National Liberal League.

THE LONDON Pall Mall Gazette has the following: "It may be from a weariness of the strife between Church and State in the Old World that some zealous Catholics begin to look wistfully toward America as the country which is supposed to accord the most absolute religious freedom to all sects and churches. M. de Molinari can scarcely help warming into enthusiasm as he tells us that 'the good fathers' (i. e., the Jesuits) have divided the United States into four provinces of their order,—to wit, Missouri, New Orleans, Baltimore, and New York. In St. Louis, where they have their head-quarters, there are twenty-nine Roman Catholic churches and a college where the studies are superintended by twenty Jesuit professors,—French, Belgian, and American. The building is declared to be a fine one, though it does not approach the magnificent proportions of the house which the ladies of the Sacred Heart have built for themselves at Marysville, a suburb of St. Louis. This convent is said to be a real palace, to which no other institution of the same kind in Europe can be compared. Among its inmates are several nuns who have fled from the 'persecution' in Germany. Hard by stands a Franciscan monastery."

AT A MEETING of the Directors of the Index Association, held in this city on November 15, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

WHEREAS, By the death of Ralph H. Ranney the Index Association has been deprived of an officer who has discharged with spotless integrity, singular faithfulness, and most generous self-devotion the uncompensated duties of Director and Treasurer in its service for the past three years: therefore,

Resolved, That we, his sorrowing survivors in the Board of Directors, desire to leave on our records some permanent testimonial of the profound esteem and warm personal regard which we so soon learned to cherish for our lamented associate.

Resolved, That THE INDEX and the Index Association have suffered through his death the loss of a friend whose zeal for their best interests has been tireless and inexhaustible, and the value of whose services can only be appreciated by the few who were cognizant of them from month to month and from year to year.

Resolved, That we have found him at all times a counsellor of rarely equalled practical sagacity and wisdom, an honorable and efficient executive officer, and a man that in every respect commanded the highest confidence of all who came into personal relationship with him; and that we shall treasure his memory as one of the most sacred and precious legacies of human worth.

Resolved, That we share the grief of his afflicted family, and offer to them our sincerest and most tender sympathy in their great bereavement.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to his family, and that they be published in THE INDEX.

THE LOVE OF GOD.

Rev. M. J. Savage, a Unitarian minister in this city of whom our readers do not now hear for the first time, and of whom it is very evident that they do not now hear for the last time, had this passage in a sermon delivered on the fifth of November:—

"Humanity will be regenerated and lifted up only as men come to love God with all their hearts, and their neighbor as themselves. I wish to define myself just here, lest I may be misunderstood. By loving God, I do not mean the sentimental gush of enthusiasm, the springing of an affectional passion towards an imaginary being and an imaginal idea. To show you how far I would convey this definition, let me refer to Mr. R. H. Ranney, who died and was buried last week, a man who thought himself and really believed himself an atheist, from the time he was able to think until his death. According to my definition of those that love God, I should most certainly reverently and tenderly include him; for what I mean by the love of God is this: the movement of the whole heart, and passion, and affectional nature, the aspiration and endeavor of man towards the ideal right, and good, and true, which, summed up, gives me my definition of God. And although Mr. Ranney rejected the definition, if there was ever a man in our city of whom it was true, it was true of him, that the generous impulses of his nature went out ardently after the best, and highest, and truest things. This, then, is what I mean by the love of God and the love of humanity."

What a change has indeed come over the world, when such words as these can be spoken from a Christian pulpit! And what a new conception of Christianity would be forced upon us all, if every occupant of a Christian pulpit should show himself so fair, so just, so liberal in thought, so kindly in feeling, so appreciative of excellence even under the dreaded name of atheism! We cannot repress the impulse to do public honor to the brain that could think, to the soul that could feel, to the mouth that could speak, such thoughts as those. They will be an open sesame to every heart not gangrened by bigotry and pharisaism.

But there are some who can not and will not believe that an atheist could be what this young atheist nevertheless was. They are utterly unable to do justice to one who dared to be so pure and unselfish and high-minded without believing in God,—nay, they can scarcely forgive him for not exemplifying by a bad character what they conceive must be the necessary consequences of such disbelief. To concede that any atheist could possibly exhibit the lustrous virtues that shone in this man's life would be the overthrow of all their creed. If atheists could be good, they think, there would be no need of religion; but religion is needful; therefore he could not be so good as is supposed. That is the way that many argue. And it is the way in which they fortify themselves in injustice.

Yet the fact stands unshaken by dogmatic incredulity; and it is a fact so full of instruction that men may well ponder its lessons. Has Mr. Savage explained it aright? Is it true that the "love of God" must be affirmed of every one who lives such a life as has just passed beyond our human ken? Much as we admire the spirit which, rather than deny the intrinsic and superlative purity of such a character, would attribute the "love of God" to one who did not believe in any power in Nature except unintelligent and purposeless necessity, we cannot accept the explanation. Mr. Savage can hardly have expressed his own entire thought in his "definition of God." The "ideal right, and good, and true," as a mere abstraction devoid of all personality, can hardly fill out his thought of God,—or, if it does, we must demur at such a use of the term. More than that, certainly, is necessary to distinguish theism from atheism. If the Universal Power is believed to be devoid of all intellectual and moral qualities,—if no spiritual likeness is believed to exist between it and the human soul, affording a basis for spiritual communion and affection,—the phrase "love of God" becomes evacuated of all definite meaning, and fails to express fitly the mental state of a serious and intelligent atheist. Mr. Ranney believed that all human consciousness is the product of nervous organization, and that there is nothing analogous to it in Nature as a whole; although he always recognized the possibility of such an analogy, he saw no evidence of it whatever, and had quite as definite and fixed a belief on this point as any Christian believer. Calm, and cheerful, and gentle as he always was in expressing his convictions, he yet cherished them with as great tenacity and decision as the most strongly persuaded theist; and to him, at least, the phrase "love of God" would have seemed utterly inappropriate as a description of his feeling and thought. The affectional element did not enter into his devotion to the "ideal right, and good, and true," though the element of reverence did; yet a "love of God" marked by the absence of the affectional element would have appeared to him, as it does to us, to be a confusion of terms. His was indeed an affectionate and loving nature, but the manifestations of it did not extend to what Mr. Savage above designates as "God"; it expended itself on human relationships. Reverence for the "ideal right, and good, and true" was unquestionably one of the most powerful and dominant forces of his entire being; and it would certainly have made him disclaim a eulogy which did not conform to the exact reality of things.

It concerns all thoughtful students of religious truth that the facts of such a life and character as Mr. Ranney's should not be even unconsciously distorted or obscured by a priori conclusions. On the one hand, he was an atheist in the sense of disbelieving utterly in the existence of any supreme or immanent Intelligence in Nature; he believed only in an immanent necessity of Law, working by unconscious and unintelligent forces, and constituting the universe a self-moved mechanism of infinite extent and complexity; and this conviction was to him just as precious and sacred as to the Christian is his faith in a redeeming Savior. On the other hand, he gave every possible proof, both in conduct and conversation, of being uniformly governed by a most religious devotion to the "ideal right and good and true"; and he made his short life not only one of purity and rectitude, but also one of singular unselfishness and spiritual beauty. Make what one will of the fact, the fact was exactly that, and nothing else. It ought not to be manipulated or tampered with in any way, but studied—as earnestly and seriously as the student of science investigates a most important phenomenon of Nature. Thus considered, it cannot fail to lead to religious truth of no small import. Our own views were widely different from Mr. Ranney's, as THE INDEX everywhere shows; but it is a matter of sacred duty to him and to truth itself to let him throw the whole weight of his life and character on the side of his own views, and not on that either of ours or those of others. Deeper than any one's intellectual conclusions, perhaps, lies the true secret of religious self-consecration and integrity of soul; and if any one wishes to know in what we find it, we can now only refer to the Index Tract entitled "A Study of Religion: the Name and the Thing."

THE AGGRESSIVE ASPECT OF FREE RELIGION.

It was natural that free religion should present first its pacific and conciliatory side. Its primary purpose was to show that all religions have the same root in human nature; that all have in common certain fundamental ideas, aspirations, principles, and precepts; that they succeeded each other in the order of intellectual and moral development in the human race; that they owe their several peculiarities to the strata of humanity in which they have taken root and the epochs in which they have flourished; and that each was probably in its flourishing season the faith best adapted to the age and the people it controlled. This in sum is our view. To maintain and justify it has been and long will be our chief aim. Our best essays have been in this direction. So prevaillingly has this been the case that hitherto the other side of the subject, the differences and antagonisms of religion, has scarcely been alluded to. The antipathies of faith have been lost sight of in the sympathies. This, too, was inevitable, for the antipathies are made sufficiently prominent all the time, are even grossly exaggerated and erroneously conceived. Differences are invented where none exist and existing differences are so caricatured and falsified that the firm presentation of the sympathies is still perhaps the best way of vindicating the full claims of any system. But, allowing every claim that the pacific method may make, it still is evident that free religion has its aggressive attitude towards religions; and may have it toward one as well as toward another.

Not towards their dogmatic ideas as such. In matters of opinion free religion raises no issue. Questions of speculative belief lie out of its province. Having no dogmatic system of its own it cannot make war on the systems professed by its neighbors. Speculative beliefs must present themselves before reason and argue their cause there. Whether they be accepted or rejected by the rational mind it is for the rational mind, in the course of its investigations, to determine. There is, philosophically, much to be said for trinity, deity of Christ, atonement, predestination, even for eternal, not everlasting, punishment. Free religion is not interested in such discussions, and has no choice as to their issue.

It simply is concerned that each of the systems shall have a fair chance to vindicate itself; that neither shall assume the right to dogmatize over the rest. In this it is concerned, deeply and primarily. All assumption of superior light or authority, on the part of any faith, even the best accredited, and the most popular it resists as earnestly and sharply as Romanism ever resisted heathenism, or Orthodoxy ever resisted heresy. Not of course in the same way; not with violent means; not with curses or execrations, but with an intense conviction. Such arrogance is the soul of infidelity. Between Rome as a religion, and Rome as a domination, it draws a broad distinction. Others may oppose Rome as a religion, if they feel called to do it. Free Religion challenges Rome as a domination, watches jealously its attempts to acquire political and social influence, has an eye on its machinations to control elections, to appropriate money and land, to influence education, to shape laws. We should be no less jealous of rationalism were it plotting to compass the same things. Protestantism would pass unmolested on the score of its doctrines, however wild and absurd they might seem, if it would desist from its intentions to "Christianize" the Constitution, to make the Bible an authority in public schools, to secure the permanence of religious usages arranged in conformity with its own ideas of human duty and public obligation. But in attempting all or any of these things it exposes itself to criticism and assault from the champions of free thought. The best creed in the world becomes intolerable the instant it arrogates to itself the supremacy that belongs to absolute truth alone. And to that only on the ground of its persuasiveness. It is a question, as Mr. Higginson said, of credo and crede. Credo is respectable and may be noble; but crede is never respectable, and never anything but ignoble. Credo is welcome to every friend of religion whatever name he may assume or may discard; but crede is never anything but a foe in the regard of the believer in freedom. Against that Free Religion girds itself for battle, and wages war on every issue raised. It is jealous, suspicious, critical, hypercritical, perhaps; but it is convinced that all error is venial by the side of carelessness.

THE WASHINGTON CONVENTION.

TENAFLY, N. J., Nov. 14, 1876.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Can you find space for the enclosed call? Please note the closing paragraph. We have been petitioning for a sixteenth Amendment since 1869, when George W. Julian introduced the proposition in the House. Our Christian brethren must yield precedence to us. They have no right to call their proposed amendment the Sixteenth. It seems to me, in the order of development, that, as all men—black and white, foreign and native, lettered and unlettered, washed and unwashed, are now enfranchised, woman's time has surely come. To those who would press any other amendment before our rights are adjusted, I would say, in the language of Scripture: "If you love not woman, whom you have seen, how can you love God, whom you have not seen?"

Respectfully yours,

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the National Woman Suffrage Association will be held in Lincoln Hall, Washington, D. C., Jan. 16th and 17th, 1877.

As by repeated judicial decisions woman's right to vote under the fourteenth Amendment has been denied, we must now unitedly demand a sixteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, that shall secure this right to the women of the nation.

In certain States and Territories where women had already voted, they have been denied the right by legislative action. Hence it must be clear to every thinking mind that this fundamental right of citizenship must not be left to the ignorant majorities in the several States; for unless it is secured everywhere, it is safe nowhere.

We urge all Suffrage Associations and friends of Woman's Enfranchisement throughout the country to send delegates to this Convention, freighted with mammoth petitions for a sixteenth Amendment. Let other proposed amendments be held in abeyance to the sacred rights of the women of this nation. The most reverent recognition of God in the Constitution would be justice and equality for woman.

On behalf of the National Woman Suffrage Association,

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Pres.

MATILDA JOSLYN GAGE, Chair. Ex. Com.

[As the next additional amendment to the Constitution, whatever it is, will necessarily be the "sixteenth," the mere matter of name is not of vital consequence; though it is pleasant to note in passing that, if the number sixteen is already mortgaged to a Woman Suffrage Amendment, the Religious Freedom Amendment, being proposed as an enlargement of that now known as the first, will not interfere with it.

But, with reference to priority of action on the different amendments already proposed, it seems hopeless to expect that any but an absolutely secular government will ever guarantee the equal rights of women as individual citizens. Christianity does not recognize them, and no "Christian government" will. So long as the nation is unwilling to secularize its government, it will be still more unwilling to emancipate woman. The shortest possible road to Woman Suffrage seems to lie through the Religious Freedom Amendment. The right of women to be counted as the individual equals of men is really one of their religious rights, if they did but know it; and their political equality will, we suspect, lag in the rear of universal religious equality.—F. E. A.]

WORD OR WORK.

This message from one of the keenest observers of the times is pithy and full of truth. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear":—

VINELAND, N. J., Nov. 15, 1876.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The numerous and able contributors to your columns, editorial and other, would seem to make unnecessary any word of mine. But I will with permission make one suggestion.

The arguments of THE INDEX are able, convincing, and conclusive against all the claims of the Church, Catholic and Protestant, to any sanctity, divinity, or inspiration not known to the world long before even Messiah or Moses appeared. But so far nothing is gained. With the Church, the conflict is not now of words, but works. The Church activities to-day exceed all that were ever witnessed before. Arms, not argument, will be the order henceforth. The canons of the sacramental host are not yet carnal, but that will not long be true. They are ever in armor, ready for use.

Shutting the Centennial Exhibition on Sunday succeeded so wondrously with the Church, that the zeal in that direction has been greatly quickened, and arrears for violations of the Sabbath now multiply on every hand. I am glad THE INDEX makes note of the portent. The Protestant Jesuits, known as "Young Men's Christian Association," are becoming the right arm of the Church for work, as really as were the disciples of Loyola three hundred years ago. And their fidelity to their priesthood is not less sacredly sworn, nor devoutly kept. Moody and Sankey machinery is multiplying, East and West, and its successes will be the wonder of the time. That, with the Young Men's Christian Association, is the grand double-cylinder "Corliss Engine" of the priesthood, and with it they will jar the globe. Meantime, the Evangelical Alliance and the "God in the Constitution" Society are working with "the powers that be," at Washington, wise and wily as serpents, and deadly as Humboldt's "pyramid of serpents," of a hundred huge, bristling heads, ready and able to deal death on every side!

I speak of things as they are. Wise men and wise women may judge what I say. The time will disclose. Words may do wonders; but only work is omnipotent.

PARKER PILLSBURY.

GOV. RICE'S PROCLAMATION.

As a curious specimen of State meddling with religion in the Centennial year, the following should be put on record in THE INDEX:—

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

BY HIS EXCELLENCY

ALEXANDER H. RICE, GOVERNOR:

A Proclamation

FOR A DAY OF

PUBLIC THANKSGIVING AND PRAISE.

For nearly two hundred years the people of Massachusetts have set apart a day in each autumnal season for the special celebration of their love and gratitude to the Lord of the Harvest for His blessing upon the labors of the husbandman, and for the ingathering of the fruits of the earth.

In continuance of this ancient and pious example I hereby appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Council, THURSDAY, THE THIRTIETH DAY OF NOVEMBER, INSTANT, to be observed as a day of Thanksgiving and Praise to Almighty God for the bounties of His Providence and the riches of His Grace.

With fervent hearts and melodious songs let the people of the Commonwealth, on that day, turn from secular avocations to the temples of the Lord. O go your way into His gates with thanksgiving, and into his Courts with praise; be thankful unto Him and speak good of His name! For the Lord is gracious, His mercy is everlasting and His truth endureth from generation to generation.

Praise Him that the Republic, with increasing vigor and strength, has passed its Centennial Anniversary, and is consecrated anew in the affection and patriotism of its people; that the Commonwealth abides by the principles of justice, of liberty, and of charity; that in the brighter illumination which knowledge is shedding through the world Science appears as the handmaid of Religion, and the visible Universe as the interpreter and counterpart of revelation. Let us praise Him for freedom from pestilence and famine. Praise Him for whatever measure of success has attended the pursuits of our people; for the liberality of those who have come to the relief of honest poverty; for the courage and fortitude which have sustained the unemployed and the disappointed; and for the cheering tokens of returning prosperity. Praise Him for the blessing of peace and fellowship with all mankind; for every triumph of virtue; for every vice forsaken; and for the holy gifts and influences which strengthen and refresh the soul. And finally, let us praise Him for all the perils that are past, for the faith that survives, and for the inspiring and beckoning hopes of immortality.

Given at the Council Chamber in Boston on this first day in November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

ALEXANDER H. RICE.

By his Excellency the Governor, with the advice of the Council.

HENRY B. PEIRCE, Secretary.

God Save the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

PROFESSOR MORSE UPON MR. COOK'S AUTHORITIES.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER:—

I felt obliged to reply to Mr. Cook's lectures on the concessions of Evolutionists, because they appeared to me to be full of misrepresentations, and what seemed "confusion" to Mr. Cook may have been the natural consequence of an effective blow. I was obliged to accuse Mr. Cook of misrepresentation and misquotation. I have now turned again to the authors he cites, and the pages he has indicated, and I still think him guilty of precisely what he has been accused of. Corruptions of rhetoric, unscrupulous harangues and ingenuity in putting things together, bringing down rounds of applause, may for the moment obscure, but cannot alter, the merits or demerits of the case.

Mr. Cook calls the attention of his hearers to the perversions of grammar in the report of my lecture. I ask them to notice in his a more serious perversion. An ungrammatical sentence is venial in comparison with an untruthful one. I take no account of his statement that I made "fifty points" against him, all of which he has demolished, whereas I count but eighteen at most; for the number, like the demolition, may pass for a rhetorical flourish.

The strenuous manner in which Mr. Cook insists that Huxley refers to Bathylus, and not to the physical basis of life, would seem to indicate not only that the Lectureship's key-stone, but the arch itself, would be badly cracked did he not succeed in making his hearers and readers take the same view.

This may stand, however, as a fair gauge of his clearness of interpretation in other cases. I know it is utterly useless to stem the tide against the enthusiastic worshippers of Mr. Cook and his utterances. Nevertheless, I would call attention to the monstrous conceit in asserting that the doctrine of evolution cannot be met unless some bridge can be found to span the chasm between the living and the not living. When we consider the thoughtful and painstaking researches of Professor Hyatt on the jurassic ammonites and other groups, and remember that he is working out his results on the basis of the "evolution of Huxley and his school," and the hundreds of other students who, in similar paths of research, are confirming the views of Darwin, it seems strange indeed that it remains for this eminent Lectureship of Boston to show that these men haven't the slightest foundation for their convictions unless they can demonstrate beyond a doubt the manner in which life first arose! Even poor Darwin has labored under a delusion for the past thirty years because his attention has not been called to this fatal omission, and that in the face of this grave oversight hundreds of experienced naturalists have been forced to abandon their previous conceptions and adopt the theories of Darwin. Surely the thoughtful reader must see the arrogance of Mr. Cook's demand.

And, in speaking of Darwin, why does Mr. Cook find it necessary to quote the erratic Carlyle's opinion, and not the opinions of professed naturalists like Professor Gray and others, whose names he so often appeals to, and who are certainly the best judges of Darwin's worth? Surely this one-sidedness seems to savor a little of injustice.

It will be observed that the Lectureship still persists that it quoted Huxley rightly in regard to that ancient skull containing the brains of a philosopher. (See Huxley's Man's Place in Nature, page 181, and compare.) It will be further observed that in spite of the years of research given to the remains of fossil vertebrates by Professor Huxley (and by Professor Marsh who agrees with him), the Lectureship still insists that Professor Dana and Professor Verrill are equally well or better acquainted with the fossils in question, though neither of these naturalists, if appealed to, would claim any such equality or superiority.

Of course, in spite of the host of observers to the contrary—notably, in this country, the cautious Wyman,—the Lectureship will insist that the oldest human fossils exhibit no approach to the ape tribe. I would still patiently inquire for the page and volume of Haeckel wherein he says that no so-called good species has ever been transmuted into another. Does the Lectureship still persist in asserting that Haeckel says that for the commencement of life we need a supernatural act? (See the page to which he refers,—Haeckel, Vol. I., page 327; also, 331.) If I have alluded to other reports in one or two cases, rather than to the official reports of the Advertiser, I heartily regret it; though, from the lecture I heard Mr. Cook deliver, I find the other reports must be relied upon as to what he actually said, and not what he meant to say. Thus the Lectureship presented the monstrous aspect of appealing to Sir Charles Lyell as living, when poor Lyell had been in his grave for nearly two years! In the words of the ancient astronomer poet of Persia, I can say:—

"If I myself upon a looser creed
Have loosely strung the jewel of good deed,
Let this one thing for my atonement plead:
That one for two I never did misread."

EDWARD S. MORSE.

SALEM, November 11.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY R. C.

The result of the election, as we write, is still undecided. South Carolina is given to Hayes, by a very small majority, by the Returning Board's summing up of the votes furnished by the County Managers. The meeting of the Board was held, we believe, in the presence of reporters, and we do not understand that any one doubts the fairness of the count, although several members of the Board were candidates for election to office. It is asserted, however, that the County Managers "cooked" their reports to the Board, and that the original returns of the Precinct or District Managers would show a different result. A recount of the returns of the Precinct Managers has been requested and perhaps may be had. Hampton is probably elected Governor, over Chamberlain, by a very small majority, and the remaining State officers appear to be divided between the two parties. Both parties yet claim Florida, and will continue to do so, doubtless, until the Returning Board declares the result, which it cannot yet do, however, owing to bad means of communication with distant portions of the State. What is true of Florida is true also of Louisiana, with the important modification, however, that few persons of either party appear to have any confidence in the honesty of this State's Returning Board. A Louisiana election has for years been a farcical affair at best, and it is extremely unfortunate that upon this State the result of the election would seem to depend. In fact, there is a great deal—with regard to the election, and, especially, the events of the past two weeks—to justify the language of the Nation in the following passage: "Considering the character of the voters and the leaders in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, we would ask whether a community like the North has often before, or ever before, stood in a more humiliating position than that in which we stood from last Wednesday week to Wednesday, waiting for the delectable politicians of those States to tell us who our next President should be, and listening to the boastings, and lies, and mutual accusations of fraud and pillage, which they kept sending over the wires to soothe or rouse us? There are lower depths than this, but not many."

To those who may believe the above language a little too trenchant, notwithstanding the aggravating character of the circumstances, we commend this passage from the same article, as, on the whole, the best summing up of the present situation we have anywhere met with: "The duty of all good citizens now, however, both North and South, is to give that highest proof of political capacity, which consists in ability to bear patiently the errors of administrators and the omissions of legislators, and to remember that the success of this government and the happiness and prosperity of the people do not depend on any one election or any one President. If the next President does not obtain his place in a satisfactory and fair manner, do not let us get in a passion over it. Such things will happen now and again under all political systems, and the value of frequent elections lies in the fact that each supplies a remedy for the faults or misfortunes of the preceding one. The worst that will happen, if there is any cheating now, and the worst that ought to happen, is that the party guilty of conniving at it or profiting by it will have disappeared before 1880 under a load of infamy; but it is the business of the voters to see that the government suffers thereby no loss of credit or repute, and the country no loss of confidence in its ability to meet all emergencies whether of war or peace."

The Episcopal Congress, to which we referred last week, was on the whole a very successful affair, and compares favorably with similar conventions of other religious denominations. There was no appearance of heresy in the Congress, all speakers accepting apparently the assumption of the presiding Bishop that there is "a changeless faith" "once delivered to the saints," and that the Episcopalians are in full possession of the precious article. But little attempt was made to define this faith however, and the claim was made that the denomination is the true home of freedom of thought, being freer even, as one speaker asserted, than the Unitarian sect. Some of the discussions on practical subjects—those, for instance, on "The Cause and Cure of Drunkenness," and "The Relations of Secular and Religious Educations"—were better, in some respects, especially in breadth of scope and in the absence of intolerance and bigotry, than anything of a like character from a religious body for a long time.

The "Sunday-Observance" Convention, held in Boston last week, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, did not succeed in adding much that was new to the discussion of the proposed question. In fact, the "Sunday question" is hardly a live subject any longer, and only needs overhauling occasionally in connection with some display of traditional sentiment like that exhibited recently in the matter of the International Fair. Outside of New England and a few of the Eastern States, the old Puritan "Sabbath" is only known here and there in spots; and even in New England it is very much modified. In many parts of Massachusetts, Sunday afternoon games of croquet or coastings down hill by boys go on merrily, with none to molest or make afraid; and in some of our large cities the naturalized and native citizens go regularly to church in the morning, to a lager-beer garden in the afternoon, and to a theatre in the evening. Legal restrictions with reference to the observance of the day are everywhere more nominal than real. Occasionally an arrest is made for card-playing on Sunday, or a man is fined for engaging publicly in some kind of labor; but as a rule, and so long as one does not interfere with his neighbors, he is at liberty, so far as legal restraints are concerned, to spend Sunday pretty much as he may deem fit. The laws which forbid a man, or any body of men, to compel others to engage in any business on Sunday are likely to remain, and during our present civilization should always remain, upon our statute books. Social and religious restraints with regard to the observance of Sunday are without doubt, at present, far more potent and unsatisfactory than those of a legal nature, and afford a good field for philanthropic work. About the most decided occasion for complaint mentioned at the Convention was that introduced by a Jewish rabbi, who stated that the Boston School Commissioners compel the attendance of children at school on Saturday mornings at the same time that Jewish custom requires the attendance of the same children at the synagogue. We believe that our School Commissioners in keeping up this custom are obeying a very stupid precedent, and would do well to follow the custom of full Saturday holidays in vogue elsewhere throughout the country; but we also believe that the Jews who insist upon synagogue attendance on Saturday instead of Sunday are following an equally stupid superstition, and would do well to conform to the customs of the country to which they belong. Admitting the possibility of a divine injunction to observe one day in seven, the dispute with regard to the name or number of the day rests upon absurd verbal quibbling, or if aside from verbal quibbling (and we believe there are some pretended arguments of another character), is altogether too ridiculous for serious discussion.

In the Beecher-Moulton controversy Judge Westbrook, upon petition of Mr. Beecher, having granted a change of venue and removed the case to Delaware County for trial, Mr. Moulton immediately "threw up the sponge," declaring that he could afford neither the time nor money necessary to follow Beecher into the wilderness. And this is the end, in all probability, of legal controversy in the notorious affair of Beecher and Tilton. Beecher does not go to jail for adultery, but is received into the bosom of his denomination as a "beloved and honored brother," and his church is so crowded on Sundays that regular attendants are requested to stay at home for a while in order to give strangers a chance; while Tilton does not go to jail for levying blackmail, but goes about the country making money by lecturing on the "Problem of Human Life." Ah, well! let us all be happy, if possible, wish "grace, mercy, and peace" for all performers in the disgusting farce, and leave a few cynics only to murmur phrases about decency and honor.

Harper's for December publishes, at the desire of the author, a letter of Mr. Gladstone, written on the 28th of November, 1872, and addressed to General Schenck, at that time Minister of the United States in London. Mr. Gladstone's purpose in writing the letter was to show that he had never deviated "from the path of a sincere good-will toward the entire people of America," notwithstanding the fact that in the volume entitled the Case of the United States, to be laid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva, a portion of the second chapter is devoted to the exhibition of "proof of the unfriendly feeling of members of the British Cabinet and Parliament," and that this portion contains extracts, apparently of a very unfriendly character, from his own speeches. These extracts are, in substance, as follows: "On the 7th of October, 1862, Mr. Gladstone declared 'that the leaders of the South had made a nation'; and 'that the separation of the Southern States was as certain as any event yet future and contingent could be'; and on the 30th of June, 1863, he declared 'that the cessation of the war was to be desired, inasmuch as to warrant its continuance, it must have an object attainable, as well as otherwise just and adequate'; that in his opinion, and, as he believed, in the general opinion, 'the re-incorporation of the Southern States was not an attainable object'; and that 'it was a fatal error, even for sincere and philanthropic men, to pursue the emancipation of the negro race through the bloodshed of the war.' Mr. Gladstone does not deny the essential correctness of the above quotations, and confesses that he was wrong, that he took too much upon himself in expressing the above opinions, admitting that he "probably like many Europeans, did not understand the nature and working of the American Union." But he endeavors to prove, by extracts from other speeches and even from the same speeches from which these quotations were taken, that these opinions were not at that time inconsistent with a friendly feeling, which he often expressed, toward the United States, and that his "sympathies were then where they had long before been, where they are now,—with the whole American people." At one time, without doubt, it would have been impossible for us to believe that one who entertained the opinions admitted by Mr. Gladstone could at the same time have been friendly in his feelings toward our nation; but we have learned some things during the years following our war, and can accept Mr. Gladstone's explanation of his position in the same candid spirit in which it is evidently offered.

War in Europe is still imminent, and may break out at any moment. Lord Beaconsfield (Disraeli) and the Czar have made speeches of a somewhat warlike character, the former explaining England's position with reference to the Turco-Servian struggle, and the latter referring to the duty of Russians to look after the welfare of their fellow-Christians in Turkey. England's proposition for a conference of the powers at Constantinople has been accepted by all but Turkey, although as we write a report comes that Turkey has finally concluded to be represented. Russia appears to be making extensive preparations for war, and there is but little hope throughout Europe that the Conference will be enabled to preserve peace. Turkey is surely in a most humiliating position. After successfully conquering rebellious subjects, she finds herself required not only to give them all they were fighting for, but to change her methods of administration and initiate various reforms in different provinces, and these requirements are demanded by the foreign nation which openly assisted her rebellious subjects. No doubt she would like to refuse, and would have many good reasons for doing so; but the penalty of refusal would be a terrible war for which she is certainly very poorly prepared.

Communications.

MAKE CITIZENS OF THE INDIANS.

LONG LAKE, Minn., Oct. 15, 1876.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

My dear Sir,—How I wish I had the capital and time to aid you in your work! You have my most earnest sympathy. I wish you could say more on the Indian question. The outrages that are continually perpetrated are horrifying. All the Indians want is protection by the laws, and to be treated like men, not like babes. They want no reservations, but to be let alone and protected in whatever pursuits they see fit to follow like any man, and, if anything farther, to be assisted to develop, grow, and be like other men. The great pretension of fighting them is all a sham. There is no idea of killing them. All that the speculators are after is to huddle them on to a reservation where they can make money out of them, and in the meantime there must be the semblance of an Indian war to enable interested parties to amass large fortunes. All the Western towns and settlements are interested in encouraging the trick, because it makes business lively and trade more prosperous. Enough money has been spent this summer under the pretence of fighting than to have built them each a house, and established them comfortably in life wherever they would like to settle and make a permanent home, as they would all like to do. They know too well the result of being forced upon a reservation to be manipulated by priests and the Indian ring.

On this point it seems to me that your own observation would bring conviction. Take any of our foreign-born emigrants, and settle them in a mass by themselves. They would keep up their old habits and customs, and it would be an age before they would take a step in advance. But scatter them about among the Americans, and they become Americans very soon. The same would be the result with the Indians, and much sooner than with foreigners, as they are more free from inveterate prejudices. I cannot be reconciled to the present condition of things, when I remember that many years ago I was among them, and was treated with such consideration and kindness. These people are worth saving; they would be a great benefit to us and we should be to them. Five hundred of their own men would be worth all the soldiers we could put in the country as a guard to protect all in their rights as men. I wish some reasonable man could tell me what excuse we can give for filling the country with soldiers this summer. Did they declare war or commit any depredations first? Not at all. The first the Indians knew, they were attacked. The result we all know. Our soldiers were defeated. The Indians were aroused, and justly, too. The next step is to send out a lot of priests, or churchmen, to accomplish what the soldiers could not; namely, to persuade them to go on to some reservation, and there to be robbed of their substance, both in mind and body.

I wish I could have an hour's talk with you; I think I could put this subject in a light that would interest you, and induce you to make THE INDEX speak a word in behalf of a race we are continually acting so unjustly towards. If you are induced to do so, pray do not advocate placing them under the control of the military. Such a course is a perfect insult to their manhood. Much more reasonable would it be to place the soldiers under the control of the Indians. Give the Indians the authority to call on the military to protect them in their rights, if the civil authorities are not powerful enough to do so, and the Indian problem is solved. I do not mean that they should be the acknowledged owners of a large extent of undeveloped country. The proper right of ownership is in actual possession by occupancy and development. The Indian has no such right; he never has done a thing towards developing the country which we are so fond of calling his. But the Indian is a human being, possessed of the same reasoning faculties, and sense of right and wrong that we have, and as such he is entitled to our consideration and assistance. He wants none of our religion; he has a religion as well suited to his capacity as any we can give him; but he wants to be taught how to sustain himself and family, when his old pursuits have become impossible. The Indians would make good mechanics, and would readily be taught; if they were settled among the whites, they would learn to do almost anything that we do. As an evidence of this I gave you several cases in point in one of my former letters. In view of this fact alone, how perfectly absurd is the idea of forcing them upon reservations! The most outrageous of all is to attempt to move them into the Indian Territory. I have no patience with Bishop Whipple in his attempts to bring this about. I must say that of all men, I regard him as the least qualified to have anything to do with the Indians. He has not a single rational or practical idea in regard to them, but he has influence with the government. If it were not for the faith I have in the good sense of the Indians themselves, I should feel that his efforts would lead to their entire annihilation in a very short time.

But enough. I did not intend to write so much, but the subject is one of interest to me, and almost unconsciously I have written what I have. As it is written, I let it go on a mission, I hope, for good.

Yours very truly, B. M. SMITH.

[We are very glad to hear from Mr. Smith on this subject, about which he knows a great deal more than we do. So far as theory goes, we are predisposed to sympathize with his conception of the right method to deal with the Indian problem; but it is preeminently a question to be settled in the light of experience. The great success of the Canadian policy towards the Indians is conceded, we believe, on all hands; cannot Mr. Smith give us some exact information concerning it? Are the Indians treated as citizens in Canada, with all the rights of citizens? If so, what is the result? The miserable failure of our own Indian policy is evident enough; what is the real secret of the lasting peace between Indians and whites across the border? If there the Indians become civilized and industrious, it certainly seems reasonable to expect the same results here from a similar policy towards them.—ED.]

A COLORED CAMP-MEETING.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Now that the noise of the battle is over, and the voices of the fiery orators in the Presidential campaign are no longer heard, it may not be out of the way to give you some account of the camp-meeting lately held by people of color in this neighborhood. THE INDEX, standing as it does at the head of the religious movement of our age, must not be quite devoid of sympathy with the longings of a faith which sprung from social conditions of more barbarous times.

A grove of tall trees, with the underbrush removed and the ground made smooth, was equally convenient for the participants in the meeting and the occupants of the stands for meats and drinks. Platforms raised on posts and covered with earth served as foundation for fires which gave light.

An interesting feature of the meeting was the peculiarity of the music. The "Chorus," who were placed on a platform a little higher than that occupied by the other performers, began by singing a verse as, "De Lawd will provide, yes, de Lawd will provide"; then the music was taken up by those placed below, and the intermingling and alternation, to some extent, of the leader's voice and portions of the song with those of the chorus of singers below had a not unpleasant effect. The burden of the refrain was, "Yes, de Lawd will provide, yes, de Lawd will provide; if ye put yo' truse in Jesus, de Lawd he will provide." When a new verse was introduced, such for instance as—"Ole Abraham he camed it dat de Lawd would provide," the same refrain came in after it, and also after every one of its three repetitions. Thus the spiritual steam was maintained at normal pitch with little expense of material. This perpetual repetition seemed to be enjoyed by those engaged in it; and one of the performers especially, a bright-looking colored Thalia, appeared from her movements at times to feel the elevating elasticity which accompanied the song. The general tenor of the theology may be judged of from the following specimen: A lady preacher, in the progress of her discourse one evening, quoted a hymn full of spiritual or spiritistic fire and cheerful poetical inspiration, the same that once appeared in THE INDEX, and which is as follows:—

My thoughts on awful subjects roll—
Damnation and the dead;
What horrors seize the guilty soul
Upon a dying bed!

Lingering about these mortal shores,
She makes a long delay,
Till like a flood with rapid force,
Death sweeps the wretch away.

Then swift and dreadful she descends
Down to the fiery coast,
Amongst abominable fiends,
Herself a frightened ghost.

There endless crowds of sinners lie,
And darkness makes their chains;
Tortured with keen despair they cry,
Yet wait for fiercer pains.

Not all their anguish nor their blood,
For their old guilt atones;
Nor the compassion of a God
Shall hearken to their groans.

Amazing grace, that kept my breath,
Nor bade my soul remove,
Till I had learned my Savior's death,
And well insured his love.

It came from the handsome ebony black face whose gloss was rendered the more striking by the contrast of white teeth, with as good a grace as it could have come from any other quarter, whether in keeping or not with its poetical shading or its "dim religious light." Possibly some consolation might have been afforded to some stricken soul or over-tender conscience, if she had recited another African hymn or piece of Scripture of at least equal authority, which is as follows:—

John de Gladd'n kill de debb'l,
Ho Billy Roe.
How did he kill de debb'l?
Ho Billy Roe.
John de Gladd'n shoot de debb'l,
Ho Billy Roe.
How did he shoot de debb'l?
Ho Billy Roe.
Good ball and silvah rifle,
Ho Billy Roe.
Whar did he shoot de debb'l?
Ho Billy Roe.
Shoot de debb'l on de lebb'l,
Ho Billy Roe, etc.

The taking up of contributions was regarded as an important part of the proceedings, and one of the speakers commented with some feeling upon the conduct of two young men, one of whom he said had put into the contribution-box a piece of wax, and the other a button; and he avowed his intention of leaving them "in de hands ob de Lawd who might do what he had a mind to wid dem."

On one occasion a beautiful example of what is called "expository preaching" was given by one of the speakers. It was as follows: "Dah was a man in ole Judee by de name o' Legion. Some folks says dat wasn't his name. But it was, and he had a wife and chil'n; and he had great many debb'ls in him, and he use a spen his time wan'rin roun monst te grave-stones 'n jumplin ober de creeks an ober de fences, and he was asides himself. Well, de Lawd come long one day, cas' all dem debb'ls out, an sho enough dey all went int de swine. Dem dis Legion he stait for home, de chil'n playin in de street dey see him comin an dey begin to holla, 'O, momma, momma, pap's a comin, he's comin right dis way; we see him runnin ober de fields, an jumplin ober de creeks an ober de fences. Peg down de windahs an bolt all de does!' Putty soon dis Legion come his self, knock at de front doe. 'My deah companion, please let me in. I is'n't asides myself no mo'. Some dese ladies heah laugh, make game dis camp-meetin, but I tell yo de troof; some dese ladies hab mo' debb'ls in 'm 'n eber dat Missa Legion hab. Well, dar was a good many debb'ls; dar was a thousand swine, and ebery swine had a debb'l.'"

"THE BIBLE THE SECURITY OF AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS."

EDITOR INDEX:—

The above is the title of one of a package of Republican campaign documents received by me a few days ago. It is "A Sermon Preached in the First Congregational Church, Washington, D. C., January 16, 1876, by the pastor, J. E. Rankin, D. D." The title is a key to its contents. It is a carefully prepared, thoroughly Orthodox sermon, contending that, if the Bible makes "high-minded men" and "safe citizens," "then the highest of all laws, the law of self-preservation, makes it incumbent on the State,—makes it not only the right but the duty of the State, not only not to permit the Bible to be crowded out of the place it has occupied in the fundamental instruction of American children, but even to make it the corner-stone of their education; to begin with it, to end with it, to make it a text-book in all our schools."

That is sufficient to make its intent and animus plain to the readers of THE INDEX. I am not surprised to meet with such views held and ably expressed in plausible guise. It is the old story adapted to a new historical epoch. The Sanhedrim rejected Christ because he was charged with setting aside the teachings of Moses, the hope of the Jewish race. The Pope, with views as broad as those of Rankin, fulminated his bulls against the heads of the States who withdrew from the religious surveillance of civil affairs. Martin Luther contended, like the free religionists of the present day, for the free reading of the Scriptures, and against the dictation of the priesthood as to their interpretation. The advocates of God in the Constitution, and the Bible in our schools, walk in the footsteps of illustrious predecessors, and they profit but little by the teachings of ages. They are a power in the land.

I am surprised to find this Bible sermon among political pamphlets forwarded from the head-quarters (in all probability) of a great national party. It appears as a disagreeable precursor of a coming storm. The union of the Protestant clergy with our civil rulers, as foreshadowed by recent events, seems to be cropping out. Religious liberty will be more or less a dead letter on the statute books, as the earnest efforts of free religionists may compel through positive, open, and decided action! We are surely in need of "high-minded" men, knowing their rights and daring to maintain them, to counteract the growing strength of the American Protestant Alliance.

EMERSON BENTLEY.

MORGAN CITY, La., Oct. 19, 1876.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND VOTING.

There will be always two or more parties who oppose each other; we have, therefore, to vote with the one which comes the nearest to our convictions, in order to carry out the principles of a Republic as well as the average capacity and honesty of officials and the people permit. We have to accept the best conditions which exist at the present time.

If I could not find better political or religious parties than as they are represented by Emperor Wilhelm and the Pope, I would vote for Wilhelm; I would vote even for the Pope as against a worse candidate. Who will deny that the United States is the freest nation existing, and the Republican party the best political organization known? We hope that the beautiful principles of the Liberal League and perfect secularization of Church and State will be carried out by that national party, just as well as the abolishing of slavery was.

I do agree with our good friends F. E. Abbot and F. A. Angell, that the secularizing of the State is very important; but who has to accomplish this secularization? Is it not one or the other ruling party? I therefore think that a "protest ballot" is a vote thrown away, and not voting at all is a neglect of a citizen's duty. Did those abolitionists who did not vote abolish slavery?

If Gov. Hayes is in favor of this anti-Republican faction, the American Alliance, it shows a pitifully perverted condition of his mind. Send him an honorary membership of the Liberal League and the "Demands of Liberalism," which ought to convince him of the folly which that deluded institution advocates; but the majority of the Republican party are against it, and, therefore, it will vanish like Know-Nothingism. THE INDEX is certainly the best pioneer for a truly free press, and if hundreds of such papers were established and each one had a large circulation, we should come nearer to the principles of a true Republic. But until then, let us work in the best way with the material we have for the ballot-box.

A TRIBUTE TO MR. RANNEY.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Nov. 4, 1876.

EDITOR INDEX:—

May I say a word in relation to the death of our devoted brother, R. H. Ranney? All who knew him will endorse what you say,—that his loss is "absolutely irreparable." For where is the man to fill his place? What our cause needs is only one such man in each State to accelerate greatly its movement. One such in each large town would give us victory in a short period of time. But it will be a long time, I fear, before we shall have them.

He not only professed, but he worked. And with him his liberal work was not a secondary matter, but the principal thing. He gave the cause everything, and I should not be surprised to learn that overwork in that direction shortened his days. It was but a few weeks while I was in Boston, working for THE INDEX, that I was permitted to be personally acquainted with him; but I shall never forget that very pleasant acquaintance, and with what energy and zeal he assisted me, and labored wherever he found liberal work to do. May his example be a lesson for us all, and stimulate us to go forward in the work he loved so well.

May I convey through THE INDEX a word of sympathy to his bereaved family? H. L. GREEN.

PROSELYTISM IN HOSPITALS.

Religious bigotry is detestable at any time and in any place; but exhibited in institutions founded for the relief of bodily suffering, and towards their inmates, who occupy one common ground as candidates for skilled attendance on their physical ailments, it is especially odious. Proselytism among the sick in hospitals is open to more than one objection; it contemplates making converts of people who, having their mental faculties more or less affected by bodily disease, are incapable of fully appreciating the nice distinctions of different forms of belief; and it is calculated to introduce an element of discord among the professional staff and other officials of an institution established for a purely secular, though benevolent purpose. It would seem that in one or more of the Paris hospitals religious zeal is being pushed to an inconvenient and objectionable extent. Dr. Despres states that in one hospital sick people have implored him to protect them from the interference and menaces of the nuns and missionaries. Patients are secretly drenched with Lourdes water. Succulent dainties are lavished on those yielding to clerical exhortations, whilst those of firmer temper are stinted and neglected. A shocking case of this kind has come to his knowledge. At the Val de Grâce Hospital, a student, generously answering to the surgeon's appeal in behalf of a soldier dying of hemorrhage, bared his arm and let his blood be transfused into the patient's vein. After the operation he, feeling weak, asked for a glass of wine of the nun in charge. She refused because he had confessed himself a deist. In going home through the chill morning air, the student caught a severe cold. Inflammation of the lungs supervened, and he is now in a rapid consumption.—London Lancet, Sept. 30.

IT IS SAID that the pig will not eat tobacco. It is singular, however, that those who hold up the pigs as models to us never hold us up as models to the pigs.—C. D. Warner.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 5 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEVENS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON,
 has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTEE, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of our country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. 4. CONSTITUTION and List of Officers.
5. EXTRACTS from Approving Letters by Distinguished Citizens.

This is the Liberal's best

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENT

In the great impending contest over amending the Constitution of the United States with reference to the school question. It should be in the hands of

EVERY VOTER,

And has been published expressly for gratuitous distribution, by earnest friends of State Secularization.

The certainty that Congress will next winter recommend to the States for adoption some form of

Constitutional Amendment,

Involving the equal religious rights and liberties of the citizens, makes it vitally important that the work of popular enlightenment should be taken up at once. This Tract is exactly what is wanted; it lays down the THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES of Liberalism, applies them clearly to the great practical questions at issue, and is a treasury of cogent arguments on the subject.

Local Liberal Leagues

Cannot do better than to order this Tract by the quantity, as an excellent auxiliary in their local agitation.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERALS

Cannot do better than to use them privately, as opportunity offers.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

WHOLE NO. 362.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental ideas on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT: PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

THE BAPTIST minister gave this advice to would-be orators at the camp-meeting: "Get yourself chuck-full of your subject, knock out the bung, and let nature caper!"

IT IS STATED that "the Centennial Commission invited Lucretia Mott to ride through the Centennial Grounds in her private carriage,—an honor which was granted to no other American man or woman."

AT THE Massachusetts State Prison, there are Catholic as well as Protestant religious services for the prisoners. Rev. Mr. Spears, the Protestant chaplain, in his just published report, attacks the Catholic services as "sectarian." What, pray, does he consider his own?

GENERAL JOSEPH R. HAWLEY now discovers that hypocritically shutting the gates of the International Exhibition on Sundays to all but favored dead-heads was a bad speculation, after all, for he has been defeated for Congress. The public are nauseated with puritanism for political effect.

THE REPORT of the Sunday Observance Convention, commenced this week, will be found full of interest as a complete treatment of the Sunday question in its chief aspects,—scriptural, historical, legal, and practical. Of course, very much remains to be said; but these essays will be found to be abundantly worth the reading.

A JEWISH subscriber in New York city writes: "I am pleased to report to you that the Sunday lectures of Professor Felix Adler, at Standard Hall, in this city, prove so far very successful. His audience is already too large for the commodious Hall, and we are looking around for a larger place. Among his hearers I notice several of the most eminent professional men in this city."

REQUESTS FOR PRAYERS for the "conversion of eight moral young men" were made on a single occasion at one of the Moody meetings in Chicago. Converted to what? Immorality? That would be the natural inference, but it would be a mistake, unsophisticated reader! The revivalists want to make "Christians"; and not only intelligence, but also morality, it seems, are unfavorable to Christianity.

A NEW SCHEME is on foot, if the following sensational statement is correct: "Father Beckx, General of the Society of Jesus, has a plan for the purchase of Palestine from Turkey, with a view to make Jerusalem the Rome of the future. Negotiations are being carried on with great vigor between the Vatican and the Porte through the Patriarch Haseoun.

Jaffa will be made a first-class harbor, and a railroad will be constructed from Jerusalem to Bethlehem."

MRS. IRVINE HOUSE, the acquitted murderess who shot her husband in New Jersey, is the latest addition to the "Christian party in politics." She intends to lecture, it seems, and expounds her platform as follows: "I shall never rest until I have divorce abolished for every cause all over the United States. I shall never rest until I have the laws relating to schools so changed that Christianity, from infancy, shall be instilled as thoroughly as the alphabet, accompanying every study, and fit my charges so that sin cannot get hold on their minds or lives. The world will learn that, although I have read medicine, and might become a practising physician, and make a living by curing, yet I believe in prevention more than cure later applied, in that as well as all other branches of practice. I have got my mind firmly made up that all the faults and sins and evils of life can be entirely overcome,—eradicated by commencing with consistent correction and Christian instruction with the infant mind within the very first years of life."

THE BISHOP of Northern Texas, judging by his remarks at the late Church Congress in Boston, must have had a severe experience: "In the course of his address the bishop illustrated the need of varying the methods of preaching by asking what was to be done when, in such a place as Texas, you met a man with his belt stuck full of pistols and carrying a Winchester rifle, who stops you and asks, 'What kind of a man are you?' and on being told that you are a preacher asks you if you ever preached from the text, 'Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe. In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them.' You say yes, you have undoubtedly done such a thing. The man asks if you believe it, and you answer that you would not preach it if you did not believe it, whereupon he says he wants to test a few of your pet converts with arsenic. The bishop dryly remarked that, under such circumstances, there was great need of elastic power in the adaptation of the service to the wants of the people."

HIS LECTURESHIP, the Reverend Joseph Cook, at Tremont Temple, November 20, thus delivered his elephantine soul with reference to the Sunday Observance Convention: "We have had in the last week, in Boston, a somewhat obscure and erratic convention, advising America to do better than she has done in following the New England ideas concerning Sunday. Give America, from sea to sea, the Parisian Sunday, and in two hundred years all our greatest cities will be politically under the heels of the featherheads, the roughs, the sneaks, and the money-grapes. [Applause.] What elephantine taste His Lectureship displays, when writing the reports of his own lectures for the Advertiser, in scrupulously noting the "[Applause]" after all the particularly elephantine passages! And what elephantine gentleness, after receiving a polite invitation from the Free Religious Association to present his own views of Sunday observance on their platform, to trumpet shrilly his defiance and crush them in this excruciating way as "an obscure and somewhat erratic convention"! This elephant is getting altogether too big for anybody but Barnum to manage. In tendering their next courtesy to His Lectureship, the Free Religious Association will find themselves in the predicament of the Irish girl who was sent to offer a cake to old Romeo, and returned to inquire, with a defeated and bewildered air: "Plaze, sir, which end of the two-tailed baste shall I give it to?"

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 3, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Sunday Observance.

REPORT OF THE CONVENTION

OF

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION,

HELD AT BEETHOVEN HALL, BOSTON, NOVEMBER 15, 1876.

Colonel T. W. Higginson called the Convention to order at half-past ten o'clock, and spoke as follows:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: The hour announced for this meeting having arrived, I am deputed to call it to order. I had but little personal concern with the arrangements for the meeting, but in the absence of the President of the Free Religious Association, I, as one of the humblest among the Vice-Presidents, have been asked to occupy his place during this session. It has been the custom of this Association to hold an autumnal Convention of some form somewhere, every year, and this year it was suggested, in view of the interest that has risen in regard to the proper use of Sunday in different quarters, that the Convention should be held here, and that the subject for discussion should be that particular point. The call for the Convention I will read, and it is as follows:—

A PUBLIC CONVENTION!

HOW SHALL WE KEEP SUNDAY?

A public meeting on the Sunday Observance Question is to be held in Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, in BEETHOVEN HALL, Washington Street (opposite the Globe Theatre), on WEDNESDAY, the 15th instant, with sessions at half-past ten A. M. and at three and half-past seven P. M.

At the morning session there will be essays by C. K. WHIPPLE on "The Scripture Evidence in regard to the Obligation of Sabbath Observance," and by Rev. M. J. SAVAGE on "The Historical Growth of the Sunday Institution in Christendom."

Afternoon session—Essay by CHAS. E. PRATT, Esq., on "The Lord's Day in Massachusetts"—a legal view of the subject. Evening session—Essay by WM. C. GANNETT on "The Working-men's Sunday"—a view of the Educational and Philanthropic uses of the day.

Addresses will follow the essays. Among the speakers expected to be present are T. W. Higginson, Rabbi Lasker, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, F. E. ABBOT, Rev. Dr. Bartol, W. J. Potter, and others to be announced. Distinguished representatives of the Orthodox, Protestant, and the Catholic churches have been invited to speak, and some of them, it is hoped, will do so. The action of the Centennial Commissioners, in keeping the Philadelphia Exhibition closed on Sundays (except to a select few), has awakened new interest in the question of the meaning and uses of the day; and a cordial invitation is extended to the public, of whatsoever shade of faith, to attend this Convention.

WM. J. POTTER,

Secretary F. R. A.

This meeting is, therefore (continued Mr. Higginson), a perfectly free one for the discussion of the Sunday question, without reference to any special propagandism or any definite action, but simply for the purpose, as the meetings of the Free Religious Association always are, of a free comparison of views. By the Constitution of the Free Religious Association, everybody who is willing to cooperate in the objects of the Association is free to speak in its meetings for debate; and, as the mere desire to speak may be regarded as a cooperation in the purposes of the Association, the Chair will be obliged to rule that it is a perfectly free meeting, and that any person present has the right to speak, when speaking is in order, under the usual limits of parliamentary order as to subject, and under the usual limits of human patience as to the amount of time taken up by each one.

The subject will be presented from a variety of points of view, theological, legal, and practical, as is necessary, and the debate, I suppose, will cover an equally wide ground. There is always an interest in a community in regard to the Sunday observance question. It begins in the family, from the time when the question arises whether the small children are to have out their dolls or not on Sunday; and when the older children, more mature, who have their individual doll which they like to play with, find the community in various ways restricting the use of these dolls on Sunday, the debate naturally continues, so that there is always a chronic discussion going on in this and every community in regard to the use of Sunday. This has lately been brought especially before the community, through the excitement prevailing in Philadelphia at the time when the question of opening the Exhibition there on Sunday was up for discussion. It seemed to develop unexpected aspects and attitudes in the community there. The proposal to open on Sunday brought allies from unexpected quarters, and was objected to in the very quarters where a cordial assent had been expected. The result of it was, as you all know, that it was decided that the safety of the souls of the community required that the Exhibition should be closed; except that there was on each Sunday found about four or five thousand people in Philadelphia whose souls were in less danger than the souls of others, and they were allowed to go in. This was substantially the same solution that has been arrived at in other places. I remember in England, a few years ago, being in London over Sunday, a friend sent me a private card of admission to the Zoological Gardens. I went there accordingly with a small party, expecting to have the monkeys and wild beasts all to myself, but found to my amazement that half the population of London seemed to have private invitations that day, and I was told that that was, on the whole, the fullest day in the Zoological Gardens. I looked around upon the well-dressed crowd thronging in all directions. There was nothing to show why they should be there, while the world outside was rudely excluded. So far as I could judge, there was nothing to show the ringed-tailed baboon whether the man who poked his umbrella at him had paid for his admission, or came in with a card from the management of the exhibition; and I suppose it was equally puzzling to all the Japanese and Chinese at Philadelphia. It was equally impossible for them to recognize the carded or the charged. But when any institution is in a transition state, thus perplexing and complicated are the phases that it exhibits. I remember hearing of a young lady once, who experienced religion, and made up her mind that it was her duty not to go to balls any longer. So, as she explained to a friend, she made a collection of all the works of vanity she had—all her ornaments, and all her faces, and all her fine clothes; and, collecting them all in one vast heap of renunciation, she thought she never should have anything to do with them, and gave them to her younger sister. [Laughter.] On the same principle, I remember once that in New York State I came upon an old law providing that whereas, during certain months of the year, oysters were not healthy—the months without the r in I, I suppose,—all oysters offered for sale in the market should be confiscated and given to the poor. [Laughter.] Thus do we solve these perplexing problems in our institutions; we confiscate the Exhibition in Philadelphia, and give it to the rich.

In all cases, I suppose, there is a desire on the part of the mass of considerate minds to find some rational intermediate ground which shall be neither the extreme of conformity nor quite the extreme of antagonism. We all admit that the Puritan Sabbath has gone forever. Nobody proposes, so far as I know, to restore it in strictness. On the other hand, comparatively few, I think, of the most extreme innovators on the Sabbath question would like to see quite the introduction into America of the European Sunday. That is, the European Sunday, as it practically exists, does away so entirely, not merely with the day of worship, but with the day of rest, that I think it extremely doubtful whether the majority even of those who come here to discuss the question would vote for its entire introduction, as it stands. If you go to France and wish to travel on Sunday, for any reason, you naturally inquire for the Sunday time-table of the railways. You will find that there is no Sunday time-table. There is the time-table; that is all. All days of the week are the same; just the same trains run, just the same number of trains, just the same stoppages on Sunday as on the other days of the week; and, however desirable it might be to leave the railroads free by law to do that, if they wish, still I think it is very doubtful whether it is for the public interest that practically it should be done; that is, whether the sacrifice, on the part of so large a number of people, of their opportunity of Sunday rest, is counterbalanced by the advantage gained to the rest of the community by the opportunity of free Sunday travel. I state this only to show what, from my point of view, seem to me the limits of the question. I am not in the slightest degree, personally, in favor of the Puritan Sabbath, as it once existed, or even as it exists now in many quarters; and on the other hand, it must be that this community, in the gradual development of the institution, will find some intermediate point between that and the practical abolition of the day of rest which greets you everywhere in Europe. As far as the law of the matter is concerned, we are told by the best legal advisers that the legal provisions on the subject rest, not upon the theological origin of the day, but upon the assumed necessity of the day of rest, and upon the desirableness of conforming that day of rest to the day which the majority of the community have, for whatever reason, adopted as their day of religious worship also. I am perhaps more accustomed to the idea of liberality on this subject than many of those present, because I happen to live in the State which has gone the farthest, I suppose, of all our older States, in the concession of religious freedom on this subject. In Rhode Island, where I live, there are the usual Sunday laws, though less strict than in most States; still there are the usual laws in Rhode Island, with a special provision, however, that these laws shall not be construed as applying to the towns of Westerly and Hopkinton. The explanation is, that in Westerly, which is a large town, and in Hopkinton, which is a much smaller town, the population consists of Seventh-Day Baptists, and they, from the time of their organization as a sect, have kept Sunday; but they have kept it on the last day of the week instead of the first. The consequence is, if you go to Westerly on Saturday, you will find one-half the factories in action, one-half the stores open, one-half the people of the town doing their usual business; and, if you go the next day, you will find that half of the factories closed, that half of the shops shut up, that part of the people abstaining from business, and the other half in full operation. It is the only instance, so far as I know, of a town, in which the direct issue has been practically made, and in which one-half of the people keep one day as Sunday, and the other half keep the other. Yet still, you will observe that even there the question is not entirely disentangled from theological association, because it is a concession in this case to a difference of opinion about what is the Jewish Sabbath, and what is not. But, so far as it goes, it is a recognition that the laws of a community must be adapted to the conscientious principles of a community, and when any wider toleration than that will be secured, is one of the problems for consideration before this meeting.

I would repeat, ladies and gentlemen, the statement which I made at the beginning: that this meeting will be devoted to some extent to prepared essays, which of course take precedence over all other business, when their appointed time comes, and that the intervening time will be given to the discussion of these essays, and that that discussion is absolutely free. The Chair would cordially invite all who are interested in this matter to take part, and especially all those who differ from the statements made in any of the essays, because it is always more interesting in a public meeting to hear the opinion of those who differ than of those who agree. But this does not merely rest upon the invitation extended by the Chair, but it is, as the Chair construes it, something guaranteed by the platform of the Association—a fact recognized whenever meetings of this sort, for open discussion, are to be held. The Chair will call attention, though perhaps it is hardly necessary, to the fact that an invitation so wide necessarily brings a perfect absence of all responsibility on the part of the Association for the individual opinions expressed. You cannot combine freedom of speech with responsibility on the part of the platform for the opinions that shall be stated, except the general restriction of decency and good order. Those who speak will speak individually, and it is not for me or anybody else to anticipate what they will speak. I heard the other day of a lady who boasted of her acquaintance with the language of parrots. She said she could always understand a parrot, if anybody would only tell her beforehand the words he was going to say. We can't give you any understanding of those who are to follow, here, but they will speak individually on their own responsibility. The first essay will be by Mr. Charles K. Whipple, of Boston, and will be read, by his request, by the Rev. William J. Potter, Secretary of the Association.

Mr. Potter said:—
I regret, Mr. Chairman and friends, that the author of this essay will not consent to read it himself; but, fearing that his voice might not fill the hall, he has asked me to do this service for him.

But at this point it may be perhaps of interest, if I read a letter I received last night from a gentleman who was invited to address this meeting, especially at the evening session. This was his reply.

[Mr. Potter here read a letter from Mr. Wendell Phillips.]

This then is the voice of the "veteran in the cause":—

SCRIPTURE EVIDENCE IN REGARD TO THE OBLIGATION OF SABBATICAL OBSERVANCE.

BY CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

Of the theological assumptions made by professional teachers of the popular forms of Protestantism, many are found, on examination, to have no sufficient evidence; but the group of assumptions implied in one of the stock phrases of those teachers, namely, "The Christian Sabbath," is specially noteworthy as being contradicted by the very documents quoted by those teachers in support of it. The book appealed to by Sabbatarians as the "inspired, sufficient, and infallible rule of life for Christians," not only gives no warrant for their claim of the scriptural appointment of a Sunday Sabbath, but proves that claim to be fraudulent as well as unfounded, it being in direct opposition to both parts of the Bible. This will plainly appear from an unprejudiced examination of the book in question.

There is a well-known institution called the Jewish Sabbath. The Hebrew people hold themselves religiously bound to observe it; and the Hebrew Scriptures not only distinctly set forth the law requiring such observance, and accurately describe in what it consists, but give us also its origin and history.

If you ask a Jew why he observes the Sabbath, he will probably refer you to the fourth of the "Ten Commandments" formerly enjoined upon his nation by Moses, at Mount Sinai, and now recorded in the twentieth chapter of Exodus. It is as follows:—

"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt not do any work; thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day, and hallowed it."—Exodus xx., 8-11.

The word "remember," above used in regard to Sabbatical observance of the seventh day, indicates that the Hebrews had already some acquaintance with it; and, tracing back the narrative in Exodus, we find the institution of such observance recorded in the sixteenth chapter. In verse 23d of that chapter, speaking to the Hebrews "on the sixth day," Moses said to them, "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord."

On the morrow, the seventh day, Moses said, (speaking of the manna which they had previously gathered), "Eat that to-day; for to-day is a Sabbath unto the Lord; to-day ye shall not find it in the field; six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the Sabbath, in it there shall be none."

But the people, having evidently known nothing of Sabbath observance before, did not put perfect confidence in this statement; and the narrative proceeds:—

"And it came to pass that there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none. And the Lord said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws? See, for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days. Abide ye every man in his place; let no man go out of his place on the seventh day. So the people rested on the seventh day."

Observe that the rest of the Sabbath was here expressly fixed for a definite day. On that day travel and one kind of labor were expressly forbidden. The Hebrews were not to gather manna, and were not to go out of their place on a certain fixed day, the seventh. And the record proceeds so say that they did rest on that day.

Now when, four chapters after (about one month after; compare Exodus xvi., 1-29, and xix., 1; xx., 8), the solemn command is given to these same people, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy" (that is, to keep it separate from other days in the manner prescribed), is it not in the highest degree probable that the Sabbath here spoken of is the same that they had been observing for a month past? And does not this probability become certainty when it is immediately added,—"Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath?"

The day is here proved to be not merely a seventh part of time, to be chosen by each according to his pleasure, but a particular day of the week, which the Hebrews were already getting accustomed to observe. That day they still observe; and the name of that day is Saturday, alike by their usage and ours. There is no more doubt that the "seventh day" of the fourth commandment Sabbath is Saturday than that "the first day of the week," spoken of in the New Testament, is Sunday.

The fourth commandment has a wider scope than the direction given a month earlier, and recorded in the sixteenth chapter. That one, the earlier, (addressed to the Hebrews and to them only, since no other nation depended on manna for food), forbade them to gather manna, and also to leave their appointed places on Saturday, the seventh day of the week. This one, the later, addressed to the same people, required them to "remember" that same Saturday-Sabbath, and to observe it by "not doing any work."

It would seem plain, even from the first aspect of the case, that the two injunctions for Sabbatical observance, one given to the Hebrew people while wandering in the wilderness, and the other to the same persons assembled before Mount Sinai, were appointed and intended for that people only. But there is positive additional evidence to that effect. In many of the Sabbatical commands subsequently recorded in the Old Testament Scriptures the limitation of them to the Hebrews is distinctly expressed, declaring Sabbath observance to have been given them as a mark of distinction between them and other nations. Here is some of the evidence:—

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily, my Sabbaths ye shall keep; for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations."—Ex. xxxi., 12, 13.

"Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever."—Ex. xxxi., 16, 17.

"And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm: Therefore, the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day."—Deut. v., 15.

"I gave them my Sabbaths to be a sign between me and them."—Ezek. xx., 12.

Thus it appears by the Old Testament Scriptures that the Sabbath was not only an important part, but a peculiar and distinctive part, of the Jewish system. Nobody supposes that the Philistines and Amalekites were required to observe the Sabbath. That observance was devised expressly as a mark of distinction between Jews and Gentiles. But the term Gentiles includes all who are not Jews; and thus Christians, unless Sabbatism is commanded in the Christian Scriptures, have no more to do with that observance than the Philistines or the Amalekites had. It was never intended for any but Jews, according to the Old Testament. To discover whether there is any such thing as a Christian Sabbath we must go to the Christian Scriptures, the New Testament.

Looking first at the NEGATIVE evidence supplied by the New Testament, we find that neither Jesus nor any apostle enjoins Sabbath-keeping. Not a single writer in the New Testament commands or recommends the observance either of Saturday or of any other day as a Sabbath. We find there no regulation for the observance of any day as peculiar or sacred, or as to be specially devoted to rest or worship. The Christian law being silent on this subject, the times of rest and worship are left free to be decided by Christians, and by all other Gentiles, for themselves. Those who wish to set aside a particular day for their own religious observance have an undoubted right to do so; but they have no right to impose such observance as a duty on other people, and no ground for declaring that God requires such observance.

The second item of negative evidence in the New Testament is that neither Jesus nor any apostle forbids Sabbath-breaking. There is need of making the statement in this form, since so many persons who call and think themselves "followers of Jesus" cry out against what they call "Sabbath-breaking." But in fact, it necessarily follows from the statement next before this—the fact that neither Jesus nor any apostle, nor any New Testament writer, enjoins Sabbath-keeping,—that in the Christian system there is no such thing as Sabbath-breaking. Where no Sabbath is commanded there is no Sabbath to be violated. Of course, then, to Christians, there is no such thing as Sabbath-breaking. If an Episcopal clergyman should stigmatize dissenters as Lent-breakers, or Christmas-breakers, he would be no more absurd than those who, claiming to be Christians, cry out against Sabbath-breaking. The Christian system, judged by the New Testament, gives no injunction respecting either Lent or Christmas, or a weekly Sabbath. The extra-Christian rules of particular sects or churches bind only the members of those bodies, and bind even them only while they choose to remain members.

It is proper to insist here upon the fact that extra-

Christian rules and customs exist in all the great sects, Catholic and Protestant. They all call themselves Christian, and all claim to adopt the New Testament as their authority in religion and their rule of life; but, as each sect differs from the others in its apprehension of the meaning and the relative importance of some parts of that book, and as each naturally emphasizes the particulars wherein it seems to itself to follow the acknowledged rule more closely than others, customs and regulations peculiar to itself are gradually formed in each, which, being supposed by its members illustrations of the eminent faithfulness of their own body, are assumed by them to be undoubtedly Christian. Their Church being, in their view, the best representative of Christianity, its rules are taken for granted to be Christian rules; and thus Mariolatry and penance are reckoned Christian by the Roman Catholic, observance of Lent and Christmas by the Episcopalian, and infant baptism and Sunday Sabbatism by the Presbyterian and the Orthodox Congregationalist, though not one of these observances finds any warrant in the New Testament. Nevertheless, if all the churches in the world should unite for that purpose, they could not manufacture a Christian duty beyond the warranty of that book.

Looking, now, at positive New Testament evidence in regard to Sabbatism, the attitude of Jesus towards it is the first thing to be considered. The ground taken by him upon this subject was such that he was stigmatized by devout Jews as a Sabbath-breaker. This man, they said, "cannot be of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath day." He accepted an invitation to a feast on that day. He justified his disciples in travelling and laboring on that day. And, in the controversy which he had with the Pharisees on that occasion, while they were maintaining the binding force of their fourth commandment upon him and his disciples, and he was denying it, he unhesitatingly made the claim that he was "Lord of the Sabbath"; a phrase which, in that connection, could have no other meaning than that he was Lord of it to reject it; that he and his disciples were authorized to disregard their Sabbath, were freed from the obligation of their fourth commandment, and might decide (as he said in another place) "even of themselves," what they should do, or not do, on the seventh day of the week. Jesus also commanded, in one case, the bearing of a burden on the Sabbath day, in direct opposition, not only to the fourth commandment, but to the express and emphatic injunctions of the Hebrew prophets, Nehemiah and Jeremiah. And, when accused in regard to this last act, he not only defended himself, but denied the statement in Genesis (which they seem to have quoted to him as pertinent and authoritative), about God having "rested" after the work of creation. Jesus said plainly, "My Father worketh hitherto." He never needed rest, and never did rest.

The point of positive New Testament evidence next in importance on this subject is the teaching of "the Apostle to the Gentiles" in regard to it. Paul, born and educated a Jew, and taught from his youth to consider Sabbath observance as a duty, would of course have continued to teach and practice it under the new religion if such observance had formed a part of the new religion. It is a highly significant fact, considering Paul's antecedents, that no word of injunction to keep either the Sabbath or a Sabbath ever dropped from his lips after he became a Christian. But we are not left to this negative evidence. He plainly teaches, in strong, varied, and multiplied forms of expression, that Christian proselytes from Judaism are delivered from the Sabbatical obligation, as from all other distinctively Jewish obligations. Observance of days, to the Jew who became a Christian, was utterly abolished. To all such, as soon as they received the doctrine taught by Jesus, Paul proclaimed their entire freedom from all Sabbatical ordinances. Hear him:—

"And you, being dead in your sins, and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses; BLOT-TING OUT THE HANDWRITING OF ORDINANCES that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross; LET NO MAN THEREFORE JUDGE YOU in meat or in drink, OR IN RESPECT OF A HOLY DAY, OR OF THE SABBATH DAYS; which are a shadow of things to come; but the BODY is of Christ."—Col. ii., 13-17.

There were at that time many Judaizing Christians, persons disposed to incorporate the old faith with the new, instead of turning decisively to the latter as preferable. To such, Paul speaks of their disposition to sabbatize as a suspicious circumstance; as showing a remainder of subjection to the obsolete ordinances ("beggarly elements" he calls them, Gal. iv., 9), of the Jewish system. To such he says, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain."—Gal. iv., 10, 11. Still, Paul claims for every man, under the Christian system, the right to make peculiar use of a special day, if he shall think it desirable. "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike; let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." Rom. xiv., 5. This passage is eminently noteworthy, for two reasons: first, it expressly allows to Christians the observance or non-observance of a Sabbath, according to the preference of each person; next, the fact of such allowances proves that Christianity, as Paul understood it, does not require nor include Sabbath-keeping.

In view of the evidence above cited, the ground taken by Jesus and by Paul may be properly called, I think, anti-Sabbatical.

It is instructive to notice that the persons in controversy with them were devout conservatives, pious Jews, who were really shocked at the denial, by the new reformers, of points so vital in the old system as the sanctity of the Sabbath and the infallible inspiration of the Scriptures. Nevertheless, when, at a later period, the distinguished success of Paul and his associates in converting Gentiles had made it needful for the Judaizing Christians to compromise for the sake of union, and to yield some points in favor of the new doctrine, the fact is specially noteworthy that Sabbath observance went, with circumcision, among the points to be yielded. The fifteenth chapter of the book of Acts gives us the proceedings of the first Christian Council, which was convened, by the authorities of the Church at Jerusalem, to consider this very matter. After full and free debate as to how many points of Judaic observance were "necessary" for Gentile Christians, "it pleased the apostles and elders, with the whole Church," to select and prescribe four only, among which Sabbath-keeping was not mentioned.

"The first day of the week" is a phrase several times met with in the New Testament; and the use of this phrase is so insisted on by Sabbatarians that one would naturally expect to find, in connection with it, some authority for the pretence that the Sabbath has been "changed" from the seventh day of the week to the first. It is on the assumption of some authority connected with this phrase that labor or recreation on Sunday is stigmatized as "Sabbath-breaking." Let us look at the record, and see what ground there is for such assumption.

We may clear the way for this examination by noticing that the first day of the week is never, in the New Testament, called the Sabbath. There, as in the Old Testament, the word Sabbath always means the Saturday-Sabbath of the decalogue. The fact that "Sabbath," in the New Testament, means a different day from "the first day of the week," is clearly shown in Matt. xxviii., 1, which says, "In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene," etc.

The cases in the New Testament where "the first day of the week" is mentioned in connection with an assembly of people, a coming together of numbers, (whether for food, worship, preaching, or anything else), are just two; two, and no more. They are the following:—

"Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus," etc.—John xx., 19.

"And upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them (ready to depart on the morrow), and continued his speech until midnight."—Acts xx., 7.

Here are two historical facts: 1. The disciples of Jesus met together as quietly and secretly as possible on a Sunday evening in Jerusalem, two days after their dispersion in consequence of the crucifixion of their Master. 2. A considerable time after this, the Christians in Troas, in Asia Minor, came together on a Sunday evening to break bread, and to hear an exhortation from Paul, who was going away the next morning.

From just these two little facts, the mention in the Christian records of Sunday evening as the time when two meetings were held, the following unauthorized assumptions are made:—

That all Christians, everywhere, are to hold meetings every Sunday.

That they are not merely to copy these incidental instances of what the early disciples did, by meeting on Sunday evening, but to devote the whole of every Sunday to rest and worship.

That these things are God's command, instead of merely somebody's hasty inference from insufficient premises.

And that God intended, by the mention that these two meetings of early disciples, in different cities and at different times, took place on Sunday evening, to have it understood that a Sunday Sabbath was thenceforth to be binding upon all Christians, in place of the obsolete Saturday-Sabbath of the Jews.

Is it not absurd to attempt to manufacture a "Christian Sabbath" out of these two evenings of the "first day of the week"? But they do it because there is nothing else in the New Testament to make a Sabbath of, while yet a Sabbath seems essential to the successful working of their theological system.

Let it be further noted that, even on the unproved supposition that these two evening meetings were held for worship, there is not the slightest reason to doubt that the disciples went to them after spending the daylight hours in their ordinary bread-earning occupations. The pretence of a Sabbatical day preceding these evening assemblages is destitute alike of evidence and probability.

The phrase "the Lord's day"—often applied to Sunday, the first day of the week, by people who wish to have it thought that God requires some special observance of that day—occurs just once, and no more, in the New Testament. The author of the book of "Revelation" says (i., 10), "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." What time, or what day of the week, he meant to designate by that, no one can possibly know, though any one may guess as he pleases. What is certain is, that you cannot get out of this passage an injunction for all Christians to observe one day of the week as a Sabbath.

The failure of the fourth commandment argument in this matter is so thorough—it is so self-evident that an injunction to Jews to abstain from labor on Saturday cannot also require, by those same words, that Christians everywhere shall hold meetings for worship on Sunday,—and there is such an utter lack of evidence in all that can be scraped together from the New Testament in support of Sunday-Sabbatism, that the advocates of that theory resort, in despair, to a text in Genesis to help them. This is it: "On the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made."

The sufficient answer to any sabbatical claim founded on this passage is, that a statement which neither directs any man to do, or not to do, anything whatever, cannot possibly be admitted as a command for a specific duty binding on all men in all ages. No priestly imposture in the world was ever greater than the citation of this passage as requiring that our Sunday be sacredly observed as a Sabbath.

The doctrine of complete identification of the Sabbath with Sunday seems to have been first formally set forth by Rev. Dr. Bound (A. D. 1595), a divine of great authority among the Puritans in England. From him it was adopted into the Confession and Catechism of the famous Westminster Assembly of Divines, thus becoming a recognized tenet of the English and Scotch Presbyterians. From them it came to this country with the Boston Puritans and the Plymouth Pilgrims, and strict regulations for its enforcement were incorporated with the first laws of Massachusetts. Portions of these Sunday laws (laws founded on the utterly mistaken notion that they enforce a rule of Scripture) are still on our statute-books, and still exercise considerable control over the community. False as their basis is, their operation is in part salutary, since it interferes with the disposition of some persons to carry on the ordinary course of labor and business seven days in the week without intermission. On the other hand, these laws have always obstructed measures highly useful to the whole community, such as the opening of public libraries, reading-rooms, museums, and galleries of art, and the running of street-cars and railroad trains on Sunday; and they have been successfully appealed to, not only to prevent public benefits of this sort, but to punish a quiet citizen for training a vine against his own door-post on Sunday morning.

Sunday-Sabbatism, even to this extent, is inculcated by the great Protestant sects which call themselves "evangelical" all through this country, and the ministers of most of them not only assume a divine ordination of it as unquestionable, but seriously present, as scriptural proof of that doctrine, such statements as have been answered in this paper. The English Church, however, does not inculcate this view of sabbatical observance among her authorized formularies, and no such doctrine or practice is known on the continent of Europe.

To sum up: I have tried briefly to show—

That the sabbatical observance enjoined in the fourth commandment of the decalogue and in many subsequent portions of the Old Testament was intended for Jews, and for no other nation or people, and that its requisition was rest on Saturday and labor on Sunday:

That, if any Christians think this fourth commandment binding on them, they also should rest from labor and business on Saturday, and should work on Sunday and the remaining days of the week, since that commandment cannot possibly be obeyed in any other manner:

That, since the Christian Scriptures neither enjoin Sabbath-keeping nor forbid Sabbath-breaking, nor specify any day for particular observance of any sort; and since Paul by elaborate argument, and Jesus both by word and deed claimed immunity for Christians from fourth commandment Sabbatism; and since the phrases which have been quoted from the New Testament as establishing a "change of the day" are found, on examination, to have no such force or meaning, the phrase "Christian Sabbath" must be held unjustifiable, and the thing intended by it as non-existent; and, finally:

That, since the view of sabbatical obligation brought to this country by the Boston Puritans and the Plymouth Pilgrims, and now taught by various sectarian bodies here and in Great Britain, can be clearly traced to its origin in the sixteenth century in a work by Dr. Nicholas Bound, and to the Westminster Assembly of Divines as the chief instruments of its propagation, we need feel no hesitation in treating it like other exploded errors, and in holding the very different ground maintained by Jesus and Paul in the New Testament.

Let it be noted that the view taken in this paper by no means impugns, or is designed to interfere with, that excellent custom and consent of civilized peoples by which the ordinary course of bread-earning labor and business is discontinued one day in seven. Rest and recreation to that extent are clearly beneficial to men's bodies, minds, and souls; and since Sunday is already used for those purposes, as well as for assemblages for religious instruction and worship, it is far better to retain, than to change, our habit of devoting that day to them. Only let the true grounds of such observance be understood, and let not sectarians impose their Church rules upon the community under the pretence that they are laws of God.

At the close of Mr. Whipple's essay, which was listened to with the closest attention, Mr. Higginson said:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: Mr. Potter has told us, with the words of Mr. Whipple, what the point of view was in which the ancient Jews regarded Sunday. It will now be a matter of special interest, as I am sure, to hear in what point of view the modern Jews, by the grace of sanctification and enlightenment, regard it; and I have great pleasure in being able to introduce to you an eminent gentleman from among their number, Rabbi Lasker, of one of the Boston Jewish congregations, to address you next.

Rabbi Lasker was received with applause. He said:—

ADDRESS OF RABBI LASKER.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I have been invited to address you this morning on the subject, "How should Sunday be kept?" As a Jewish minister, in harmony with the teachings of Judaism, I must say that the Sabbath day is a day of rest and of sanctification; a day of joy, and of recreation, and elevation of the mind; a day on which the whole human family shall be united in love, peace, union, and harmony, and to remove from their hearts all the cares, and the sorrows, and troubles, and anxieties of worldly affairs. One of the oldest maxims in Judaism, pronounced by our rabbis many centuries ago is, I will give it in Hebrew: "Chasside navummoth yesh lohem chelek, laolom nabah." "The good, righteous, and best of all nations, of whatever dominion or sect they may be, have a portion in eternal life; hence will enter the kingdom of heaven." This dominant idea belongs to Judaism, and hence Judaism leaves every man to believe what his reason tells him to be true, to worship as his own mind and his own conscience may dictate, and to observe the Sabbath day according to his own ideas, and customs, and usages. This principle is in strict harmony with the blessed idea of civil and religious liberty. This idea has been adopted by the fathers of our glorious republic, and proclaimed at the opening of the grandest scene ever presented to view in the world's history—the Declaration of Independence,—where it is said: "All men are born free." "They are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This idea distinguishes our glorious country over all other countries. It is the true democracy in religion. It is the length and breadth of our freedom, for which we contend. It is a matter of justice to all its bodies, and to every individual soul, to see the truth for himself and to worship according to his own ideas of right.

As a Jewish minister, from a Jewish standpoint, I am compelled to ask the question, Which is the true day of rest? Is it the seventh day, the Sabbath, the Sabbath of the Bible, which Moses ordained and which he represents as having been blessed and sanctified by the Supreme Architect of the Universe? Or is it the first day of the week, Sunday, or the so-called Lord's day? This subject has been already exhaustively treated in the scholarly and able essay by Mr. Charles K. Whipple, and read before you so masterly by the Rev. Dr. Potter. I could certainly not add anything to it; but permit me, ladies and gentlemen, to cast a short glance upon the history of the Sabbath.

It is generally admitted that the book of Genesis is the most ancient record of the human family, more ancient than all other known books. It recounts all the events which transpired from Abraham up to Joseph; and whenever that may have been written, or whoever was the author of that book, it is certain that it was the Bible of the Hebrews before Moses ever said a word that it was the Bible of the Israelites in Egypt. As far as man's memory runs back into the remote antiquities and to the dim outlines of the origin of tradition and myths, so far back the seventh-day Sabbath is to be found, an existing institution. We find therein frequent allusion to the hebdomadal division of time. The number "seven" is always sure to convey to us the idea of perfection and completion. The fact is related there that God created and finished his work in six days, and rested on the seventh. Noah was warned of the approach of the deluge seven days previously; on the seventh month the ark rested on Mount Ararat; Jacob mourned seven days for his beloved Rachel, and so did Joseph for Jacob,—also he served seven years each for his wives; Pharaoh's dream was interpreted by Joseph to denote seven years of famine and seven years of plenty. We have all along cases of the symbolic number "seven." The symbolic meaning of it is in the hebdomadal division of time and the holiness of the seventh day. Now it is also a fact that the Israelites in Egypt must have known of the Sabbath, and perhaps observed this day whenever they had an opportunity to do it, whenever they were not prevented by external labors. This is obvious, as it has already been stated to you in Mr. Whipple's essay. It is obvious in the decalogue, in which the fourth commandment, the Sabbath commandment, begins with the word "Sachor," in Hebrew—"remember."

Now only that which exists, that which is known, can be remembered; otherwise not. Hence the Sabbath day was already in existence before the decalogue was given, and the reason why the Sabbath shall be celebrated is stated in the twenty-first chapter of Exodus, I think it is, or the twentieth: "God made heaven and earth in six days, and rested on the seventh." It is also stated there: "Between me," that is, God, "and the children of Israel it shall be an everlasting sign." It need not be proved that the Israelites always observed the exact Sabbath day. But it never disappeared from the historical record since Moses; the histories of Jeremiah and Josephus, the authors of the New Testament, and many Roman writers, mention the same identical Sabbath day, which reached back into traditions, and myths, and through all this chilly twilight of human affairs. It is also a known fact that Christians and Mohammedans selected another than the seventh-day Sabbath, in order not to be identified with Jews; hence not for the motive of the divine revelation or of philosophical intelligence. Those who believe in a revelation of Providence in history must stand still before this venerable monument of this people, and must say to themselves: "It must be the will of God that this should be the Sabbath." If it is not so, why has this day been retained distinct, from the beginning, forever? How comes it that the prophecy concerning that Sabbath day—"Between me and the children of Israel it shall be a sign forever"—is so fully, and completely, and continually fulfilled to this very day? Here we Jews stand thirty-four hundred years later in history, and the same Sabbath day, with the same name in all modern languages, is still the sign between God and Israel, still the sign and the symbol of God's covenant with Israel. No holy day in the world's history has so well kept its rank as this Sabbath day has.

Therefore it appears ridiculous, when the Israelite is asked to make Sunday his Sabbath. You might just as well try to make, or attempt to do away with, this earth which God has made to be, as to do away with the Sabbath which Providence ordained and established to be; as little as the Hebrew language can be forgotten, being the language of the Bible, just as little can the Sabbath day be changed. Error will be overcome, and the intelligent American will observe that the Sabbath of Jehovah is not Mahomet's Friday or the Emperor's Sunday. The Word of God will last forever. Thousands may disregard and put up a religious system for themselves, and ignore God's Providence in history, or interpret that according to their own preconceived opinion; but this changes not the fact. Millions can well remain faithful to the sacred cause and to its lessons.

Ladies and gentlemen, I respect the man who respects his Sabbath. I hold that all men should respect their Sabbath day, the day of rest. I would that every person should not only rest on his day of rest, on his Sabbath day—be it Sunday or any other day: that be immaterial to us,—but that he should also observe all the ordinances of morality, of humanity, of virtue, of justice, and of religion. But on the question whether the State possesses the constitutional power to enforce religious observances, I part company with our very zealous, but, I should say, misguided friends. Our Constitution recognizes only the power of persuasion, not the power to enforce religious observances. The Constitution of the United States secures to every person, be he Christian or Pagan, or Jew or Mohammedan, the free exercise of his rights and conscience. It distinctly declares, every man may worship his God according to the dictates of his conscience; and with such fundamental law, how can the legislature declare that every person, be he Christian, or Infidel, or Jew, shall observe the Sunday-Sabbath? Is it the legitimate province of the legislature to decide what religion is true or false? Our government is a civil, and not a religious, institution.

But there is another question I want to speak upon most especially to-day. I am yet quite a stranger in this city, only a year not quite two weeks; yet I find, to my great consternation and astonishment, that in this free and enlightened State of Massachusetts, and especially in this city of intelligence and American opinions, more than two thousand human souls, little young souls, who are not only not found entirely to observe Sunday as a day of rest, but not even to respect it. Worse than that, sir; they are indeed compelled to disregard their own Sabbath day, the seventh day of the Bible; they are kept away from the observance of their religious duties. I refer to the Saturday morning sessions in our public schools. Whatever the motives of the School Board may be in upholding this session, I do not know, neither do I comprehend, why it is maintained, since I know not what advantage there is in a school session on Saturday. From twenty years' experience as a schoolman, I positively know that five days in the week are sufficient for any child, even the strongest, to attend school. Long school hours on six days in the week are certainly detrimental to the health and intellectual welfare of the child; it is too great a strain on their little brains; it impairs their intellect and their minds. Yet, in spite of many remonstrances, and petitions, and prayers, and complaints, by Christians as well as Jews, I understand the School Board does not countenance these petitions, and does not right the wrongs inflicted on more than forty thousand children here in this city alone in the public schools, among which are at least between two and three thousand children of the Jewish persuasion. I have been told that some masters and teachers are very kind and lenient, and have easily granted excuses; but in most cases, I have been informed by members of my own congregation, they are compelled, not only to attend school, but also to write, for instance,—the girls to sew, and to perform other things which are in direct contradiction to the requirements of Judaism. And if there should be found a child bold enough to refuse to do it, why, other children are brought forth by the teacher who are not so strict, have not been brought up in the requirements of their religion, and the teacher says, "This boy or that girl does it; why can't you do it?" The consequence is the yielding of the child to its taskmaster. The children have to be there on Saturday, and be excused from half-past ten in the morning, too late to go to their house of worship, or else they will be punished; they will lose their good marks of merit, their good standing in school, or they are put back into lower classes.

The Israelites, from time immemorial, have always taken a great interest in education and enlightenment; and, indeed, the pride of knowledge, wisdom, and intelligence has been the greatest pride and glory of Israel. Even the poorest amongst the poor spent his last mite for the instruction of his child. "Education, humanity, enlightenment"—these are the mysterious echoes from Israel's history, which solve the problem of its marvellous preservation; "education, humanity, enlightenment"—these are the three watch-words of our age, and shall be the watch-words. Now what are the Jewish parents to do here? If they send their children to school on Saturday, they never, or very seldom, have the opportunity to attend worship, to elevate their hearts heavenward, or listen to the law and word of God explained by their minister, and mingle their prayers of adoration to the God of their fathers; and they can't send their children to the house of God, as their religion requires; for they lose their standing in school, are put back in lower classes, perhaps,—which is standing in the way of their promotion. But, indeed, this education, the intellectual welfare of their children, is just as sacred to them as their spiritual welfare. They want to bring them up to be a pride and ornament to society, to be good and loyal citizens to their country, and a blessing to humanity. As I was told by the principal of the Brimmer School last week, the Jewish children are counted amongst the brightest, the most accomplished in deportment and in scholarship, the first of their classes.

Now, I ask you, ladies and gentlemen, do you not call this a spiritual oppression in the strictest sense of the word? Where is our religious liberty? Where is the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of our conscience? Do you call such a proceeding right, proper, just? Is this spirit in harmony with the fundamental principles of our country? Now while children of all other denominations have the privilege and the opportunity of visiting on Sunday their various churches and attending divine worship, the Jewish children are deprived of such a blessing. If such children, deprived of their spiritual instruction, should one day, having grown up, happen to fall into the hands of men and women who have no fear of God or love of God, who are full of arrogance, and pride, and selfishness, whose minds are entirely devoted to pleasure,—are not such children to be pitied? Will they be strong enough to withstand all the temptations and allurements of this world? No, I don't think they will; for they are in the midst of wicked company, whose life is full of violence, who have no Sabbath day, and no rest, and hence no self-culture, no self-refinement.

But as a reason for the non-abolishment of the Saturday morning session, it was declared to me last week by a gentleman: "Should the Jews insist on having the Saturday morning session discontinued, the Catholics will also come and demand the release of their children on their holidays." Now I have great respect for this denomination, and I sympathize also with their demand. I think that the schoolmaster is not the absolute lord and master of the child, and I claim that every parent has the right, whenever he wants, to take his child out of school to observe a holiday ordained by his respective religion. But what have the Catholic holidays to do with our Saturday? I do not know whether any of the Catholic holidays ever fall on a Saturday; besides, has not the Jewish religion also holidays and festivals during the year, to celebrate and preserve, which indeed the children are required to solemnize? Again, are not Jewish children deprived of the benefit of their education and instruction on Christmas and New Year, and other days, being also Protestant holidays? In the name of reason, in the name of humanity, progress, and enlightenment, in the name of God, I protest against such spiritual oppression. I demand, not only the discontinuance of the Saturday morning session for the sake of sectarian purposes,—more, I demand it in the name of forty thousand children attending the schools here in this city; I demand it for the sake of their health, of their spiritual and intellectual welfare; I demand it for it is a necessity for them. And I hope and trust, may, I entreat you, ladies and gentlemen, to give me your assistance, that my endeavor shall go through with a perfect success. We demand it as our right, as citizens and as men. Our country, as I said before, is a free country, and freedom must be based upon justice; justice must be based upon equality, which means equal rights, equal privileges, and equal duties. I thank you, ladies and gentlemen, for the attention which you have extended to my feeble remarks. [Applause.]

(TO BE CONTINUED NEXT WEEK.)

TWO NAMELESS MEN.

We find in the local columns of our exchanges these fragments of the history of two men which seem to us worth repeating, even in the noisy rumors of impending wars in Europe or of the returns of our own State elections. The story claims attention and bears its meaning, although it concerns only two obscure and nameless men, the one a mechanic, the other a druggist's clerk. The latter, a lad (Charley is the only name given), was a few weeks ago prescription clerk in Lippman's drug store in Savannah. Not a place where any earnest of heroism is likely to open before a young fellow, or where glory of any kind would await him. "Charley" apparently had no thought of heroism or glory; he only put up prescriptions, as it was his business to do. When the yellow fever broke out, the owner and whole force of the shop left,—all but the book-keeper and Charley, who quietly continued putting up prescriptions. At last the book-keeper fled, and Lippman, by letter, ordered Charley to close the shop, his friends in Augusta urging him at the same time to come to them. But he said, "Somebody must give medicine to these people; I'll not leave my work," and went to the other drug store, Clay's, and worked there day and night. Clay took the fever and died, Charley nursing him. His cook took the fever, and a young friend, Symons. Charley nursed them both until they recovered, giving out at the same time thousands of prescriptions daily. He wrote to his mother, "I have not had time to take my clothes off for weeks." After Symons was up Charley took the fever. His friend, still weak from illness, nursed him in his turn, telegraphing twenty times a day to his friends in Augusta, "Charley improving," "With good care will pull through," "Charley is worse." The last telegrams were, "I will stick to him to the last," "I will not sleep tonight." But he did sleep. The next morning the two brave lads were found together—dead.

About the same time the terrible explosion of the Sable Iron Mills in Pittsburgh took place, and this is part of the account given in the daily papers: "The assistant engineer was found speechless, his hand grasping the throttle of the engine with such force that it required two men to remove him. He might have escaped in time to save himself, but his idea was that he could avert the catastrophe from the workmen by turning off the steam. His terror was extreme, and no wonder. He died an hour later." The man whose terror was extreme, and who yet stood at his post when he might have escaped, was a hero with qualities beside which mere brute courage is mean.

Why do we tell the story of these two men of whom we are not able to preserve even the names? Simply because their chance for a noble death and a great deed in dying may come to any one of us. In old times knights buckled on their armor and went out in public to win renown; even the crown of martyrdom was won by the help of the heroic glow of lofty excitement, "a great cloud of witnesses," tyrants, saints, and angels looking on. Nowadays, men and women have their daily monotonous work set before them. It is plain, hard duty that is called for, seldom feverish heroism. We believe that in the pursuit of that duty men are trained year by year to greater sacrifices; that when life is called for, as in these two cases, it is quietly offered, with no thought of fame or applause, but simply as a matter of course. Poets and romancers sing of Roman courage and medieval chivalry, but we should like American boys to look into the secret of this plain matter-of-fact duty and the doing of it. The young knight, keeping vigil, praying all night in the lonely chapel in his white robes, going out in the morning to receive his sword and spurs, is always a most heroic, enviable figure in their eyes. But what of this druggist clerk Charley, who had not time to change his clothes, nursing his friend and a poor negro through a loathsome disease, hurrying from his bed to the shop to deal out medicines to the plague-stricken city, and lying down, worn out at last, to die? There was no hope of accolade, no fame waiting for him in the back room of the little drug-shop. He knew his duty and he did it. And if it was not after the high old Roman fashion, it was after a nobler and a better way, and Death was proud to take him.—N. Y. Tribune, Oct. 21.

IN EARLY times, Satan was regarded as the ugliest scamp in creation; and those who have been privileged to see an illustrated book of the fifteenth century will remember how he seems to concentrate in himself all the most terrific and brutal qualities of the barbaric imagination. We don't forget the very earliest ideas as to the divine origin of Satan. He was the greatest of the rebel angels,—Lucifer, son of the morning; and he figures grandly in the Book of Job, and in Milton's Paradise Lost. Indeed, it has been said by daring critics that "Milton has done more to keep the devil alive than any other single author." It is certain, however, that after Milton a period of degradation set in the popular conception of Satan. But at length with the revival of philosophy and the progress of science, the form of the personality, if not the character, of Satan began to improve. His tail either dropped off or got worn away by sedentary occupations; his horns and cloven hoofs disappeared; and then he sprang forth in Goethe's Faust and Bailey's Festus in the form of a gentleman, with the instincts of a ravenous questioner,—in fact, a grand sceptic. From this we may infer that Satan for some time past has been subject to the laws of morphology or evolution. Certainly, he was once as ugly as an ape; now he is as handsome as a prince. If this process only goes on long enough, it would be hard to foretell what might become of the grim personality. Happily, there is little danger of his abolition while evil exists. The hold which he has got on the human mind is too profound for that.—Glasgow Herald.

DURING A thunder-storm, a gentleman takes a hack down the Champs Elysées towards the Faubourg St. Germain. He notices that at every flash of lightning his driver pliously makes the sign of the cross, and says: "I observe that you cross yourself; you do well." "Oh, yes, it is always well where there are so many trees; but once we get into the streets I don't care a —."

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Please remit by post-office money-order, by registered letter, or by draft on Boston or New York. Checks on interior banks are liable to discount, and the term of subscription will be proportionally shortened in the credit.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or single numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

N. B.—When writing about a former remittance, always give the date of such remittance as exactly as possible.

The Index.

BOSTON, NOVEMBER 30, 1876.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 251 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. Tolson Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

MR. CHARLES P. SOMERBY has begun the publication of a handsome periodical called Prometheus. Its motto is, "To destroy, you must replace." Its object seems to be to promote the cause of Positivism, and also "to keep a record of the best Oriental, philosophical, and scientific works." The name of the editor is not given. Address C. P. Somerby, 139 Eighth Street, New York. Price, $3.00 a year.

"NUNC DIMITTAS!" Since there is a little embarrassment still in deciding whether Democrats or Republicans have won the Presidential election, why should not the people, as a compromise, declare the following ticket unanimously elected? We quote from the Wabasha County Sentinel, of Lake City, Minnesota, in its issue of November 8:—

Dr. Boutelle, who is known to be a "Liberal" in his views, produced the following peculiar ticket for the suffrages of the people on election day. We publish it as an item of curiosity in its way:—

INDEPENDENT TICKET.

Equal human rights for all,—white or black, rich or poor, male or female, orthodox or heterodox! Our secular national Constitution securing equal political and religious freedom to remain unimpaired.

For President—Robert G. Ingersoll, of Illinois.
For Vice-President—Francis E. Abbot, of Massachusetts.

Presidential Electors—S. C. Gale, Frank J. Mead, Allen Graves, Sylvester Dickey, and James G. Richardson.

REVELATIONS are still obtainable in the nineteenth century, if this story in the Tribune is credible: "Mohammed his ghost ought to be astir when Islam is marching to the wars. And he is, for he has appeared in broad daylight before the eyes of the guardian of his tomb at Medina. Shaik Ahmed had finished his prayers; it was two o'clock in the afternoon; the founder of the faith appeared unto him in a vision, and this is what he said: 'Ahmed Hossain, my followers are sinning. Seventy thousand of them have died lately. Of that number only seven have died in the faith. In consequence of the prevalence of such sins as bribery, drunkenness, murder, forgery, adultery, etc., and the neglect of fasting during Ramazan, God withheld rain. My instructions previously given have not been heeded. Kings have not ruled justly. They have all become tyrannical. It has been revealed to me that my followers do not fear the anger of God, though the Day of Judgment is nigh. I prayed for the pardon of my people. It has been revealed to me that in 1296 H. darkness will cover the face of the earth. It will commence in the beginning of Jammadoosanees and continue to the middle of Rujjub,—a month and a half. During the prevalence of this dense darkness, Hazrat Imman Mehndi, the last of the prophets, will come to earth, and Jazrael will also come to take up the Koran. Whosoever will freely circulate this my revelation will be protected by me in the Day of Judgment. Whosoever doubts the revelation is an infidel and will go to hell.' Shaik Ahmed vows that this is the truth and not a lie; else may his face be blackened both in this world and the next."

DR. SPEAR'S "RELIGION AND THE STATE."

Rev. Samuel T. Spear, D. D., of Brooklyn, has gathered into a volume of nearly four hundred pages, with the above title, a series of able articles contributed by him to the New York Independent. Especially when considered as the work of a Presbyterian clergyman who adopts and defends the secular theory of government, it is a very notable addition to the literature of this subject, and cannot fail to do immense good among those who will not listen to arguments for public justice in matters of religion, if offered in any other name than that of Orthodoxy. Dr. Spear, believing fully and strictly in the Evangelical Christian theology, and yet also espousing that view of civil government which forbids it to recognize even general Christianity as the religion of the State, undoubtedly represents a considerable minority of the Protestant Christian population of this country, in their honest endeavor (fruitless as we think it is) to reconcile Christianity with the natural rights of man,—above all, with entire freedom of thought, democratic principles, and complete religious equality before the law. It is difficult, perhaps impossible, to determine precisely how large a proportion of American Protestants are embraced within the limits of this Christian secularism; we do not think that it is a large proportion, since, if it were large, it would long ago have secured the secularization of the public schools. Nothing stands in the way of the exclusion of the Bible and all religious worship and instruction from the schools, except the fixity of the great bulk of Protestants in the conviction that the State is bound publicly to recognize and foster what, with complacent absurdity, they designate as "unsectarian Christianity." In the great battle for freedom and justice against this stupid, obstinate, and dangerous stultification of the first principles on which the United States government is grounded, every freethinker should welcome with alacrity and cordiality the important aid of these friends within the enemy's lines. It was in this spirit that Dr. Spear himself was invited last spring to accept nomination as one of the Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League—an invitation which, for reasons not stated, was very courteously declined.

The pages of this well-written and well-printed book are rich with felicitous, unambiguous, and comprehensive statements of the secular principle in the abstract. A few of these we must quote:—

"The State, by which we mean the people acting in their organic capacity through the machinery of law, should say to all the religious sects, to all anti-religionists, and indeed to all classes of citizens, that its ground as to the public schools is the one of absolute and impartial 'neutrality' with reference to the doctrines and tenets of religion, whether drawn from the Bible or elsewhere; that the ends for which it exists do not include such doctrines and tenets, either as a means or an end; and that the only aspect in which it can consider Protestants, Catholics, Jews, Rationalists, Infidels, indeed every man, woman, and child subject to its jurisdiction, is simply that of citizenship, without any discrimination for religious reasons. The public school is not a church, or a synagogue, or a theological seminary; but a piece of State machinery, organized and supported for purely temporal ends—as really as a court of justice, a constitutional convention, or a legislative body. Its function is not to make or unmake Christians, or predispose children to this or that form of religious faith. It does not propose a complete education; and does not propose a religious education at all, either partial or complete. It proposes to do a certain thing, on the ground of its necessity and utility to the State, and to stop there, by not entering that field which lies beyond the purview of civil government. In short, it proposes a secular education, and that only—an education that would be needful and useful in this life, if there were no God and no future life for the human soul." [pp. 52, 53.]

"We deny that the State has the right to tax the Jew to propagate Christianity, or to make Infidels help to liquidate the expense account of a religion which they repudiate." [p. 75.]

"The doctrine of democracy is that the ruler represents the sovereignty of the people. The doctrine of theocracy is that he represents the sovereignty of God. The former, not the latter, is the doctrine upon which the civil and political institutions of this country are founded." [p. 186.]

"This disclaimer by Washington in negotiating, and by the Senate in confirming, the treaty with Tripoli, was not designed to disparage the Christian religion or indicate any hostility thereto; but to set forth the fact, so apparent in the Constitution itself, that the Government of the United States was not founded upon that religion, and hence did not embody or assert any of its doctrines—and hence, again, that as a government it had and could have no hostility to a 'Mohammedan nation' on account of its religion. The language of this article in the treaty was used for a purpose, and that purpose was in exact correspondence with the fact as contained in the Constitution itself. Christianity, though the prevalent religion of the people when the Constitution was adopted, is unknown to it. The Constitution says that it shall be unknown to it as having any place in the organic law of the United States, or in the legislative powers of Congress." [p. 211.]

Strong and clear, however, as Dr. Spear is as to the general relation of the State to Christianity, he is not equally strong and clear as to the special applications of the secular principle he advocates so ably in general. He favors the prohibition of the Bible in public schools and the abolition of tax-exemption for ecclesiastical property; but he fails to see that the "American Sabbath" legislation, the civil oath, the chaplaincy system, the blasphemy laws, the Thanksgiving and Fast-day proclamations, are really violations of the secular principle—furtive and indirect and too often insidious attempts to bolster up Christianity by State support and favor. There is in the latter part of the book a good deal of special pleading—we cannot use any term but that—to explain all these things in harmony with the broad principles laid down so admirably in the first part. Dr. Spear himself will be very likely before long to discover the weakness of his own argumentation here; his logical mind cannot long be satisfied with such overstrained reasoning, and we will not forestall its spontaneous action. We are all the more encouraged in this expectation by the fact that this very book gives evidence of his honest teachableness and rapidly increasing thoroughness as he carries forward his own task. We refer to the very different ground he takes in different passages as to the propriety of amending the United States Constitution so as to secure the secularization of the State by the national organic law. This is so momentous a subject that we must point out the evident change with regard to it wrought in Dr. Spear's mind, while writing this very series of articles.

Commenting on President Grant's famous Annual Message of last year, Dr. Spear says:—

"The President is right in his opinion that church property should be taxed in common with all other property; yet the whole genius and spirit of the Constitution leave this question to be determined by the respective States." [p. 20.]

"Whether a State shall have a public school system or not is purely and absolutely a State question—as much so as the question whether it shall have a prison or a police system; and it should be left to the sovereign discretion of every State." [p. 21.]

Dr. Spear was thus, at the writing of his earlier articles, in favor of leaving the decision of the church taxation and the school questions to the separate States exclusively, without settling them as national questions at all. At the same time, however, he advanced arguments against leaving the school question to be settled by school districts, and not by the States, which are just as forcible against leaving this question to be settled by the States, and not by the nation. He says:—

"If the whole people as represented in the Legislature cannot wisely dispose of the subject, is there any prospect that the people acting in these divisions of the State will be able to do so? The plan would beget animosities and strifes in the school districts, and lead to a general war of sects over the public schools." [p. 49.]

Precisely the same reasoning would lead to the conclusion that the nation, and not the States, should settle the school question on general principles. If the United States are a nation at all, the principle of absolutely secular government, now contained in the Constitution, should be made dominant everywhere throughout the nation, as the necessary condition of the public peace. Dr. Spear himself, enlightened by the signs of the times and the progress of the discussion, came to the same conclusion before finishing his series of articles. Pointing out the defect of the Constitution in omitting to guarantee secular (as well as "republican") government in the several States, he says:—

"We do not know what shape the school question will finally take, or to what collisions it may lead. What we do know is that our National Constitution, except as against encroachments by the General Government, does not stand guard over the religious liberties of the people. . . . Would it not, then, be wise so to amend the Constitution that this great question of religious liberty in all its phases and applications" [and these certainly include the church taxation question] "shall be settled by the fundamental law of the land, and so settled that the whole people, as one political organism, shall be charged with the protection of such liberty? Would it not be wise to make religious liberty in every State a national idea? . . . There is nothing in it to make it a local idea, or require that it should be remitted to the exclusive jurisdiction of the States." [p. 223.]

This is a complete reversal of the position of the first part of the book; and it is a change greatly for the better. It is a cause of great satisfaction to see so candid and logical a mind as that of Dr. Spear thus brought to plant itself on the ground publicly held and advocated by THE INDEX ever since January 1, 1874; and the fact that he is a Presbyterian clergyman only increases his satisfaction. So completely has he abandoned his earlier position that he now even proposes [p. 284] a form of Constitutional Amendment to carry out the idea of the last-quoted extract. It would not, however, be completely efficacious, since it would not affect the questions of church taxation, Sabbath legislation, and various others indicated in the "Demands of Liberalism." It is only fair to suppose that the same progressiveness exemplified by this book itself will yet lead Dr. Spear to take the more advanced and consistent ground of these "Demands," and to accept, as a substitute for his own fragmentary and imperfect amendment, one at least as thorough-going as the "Religious Freedom Amendment." There is no stopping short of that, logically. The nation must eventually adopt it, or drift back to the theory of a "Christian government." Every logical thinker who understandingly accepts the general principles laid down by Dr. Spear will be compelled by logic itself to take at last the uncompromisingly radical ground of THE INDEX on this question; and Dr. Spear will, we hope, yet carry out his own brave and just thought to that very conclusion. Meanwhile we most heartily recommend his book to our readers as a very able, very sincere, and very useful treatise on State Secularization, which ought to be in the hands of every reflective citizen from Maine to Texas and California.

WAS IT USELESS?

Some persons who have criticised the Convention recently held in Boston on the Sunday Observance question, appear to think that it was a very useless and silly affair. "Why attack," they say, "a lingering superstition like that of Sabbatarianism, which has so nearly lost its power and is growing weaker every day? To be sure, there are Sunday laws on the statute books, but they are practically dead, and people have in reality all the liberty on that day that they desire."

Such is the argument we are hearing in certain quarters. Of course it is not the argument of those who believe in the old kind of Sunday observance, but of professed liberals, who seem to think that things somehow move of themselves towards social and religious reform without anybody moving them. That there has been a great change in public opinion in this country during the last century on the question of keeping Sunday—a change due to general enlightenment and progress in religious views—is beyond question. But somebody has been all the time moving, and speaking, and writing, and reading, and thinking, or this general enlightenment and progress would not have come. Was any reform ever effected in human affairs without somebody being interested enough in it to work for it? Moreover, to call Sabbatarianism in this country a feeble superstition, to speak of its power as a thing of the past and practically dead, is at the least a very audacious statement, in view of the fact that less than six months ago it was strong enough to shut the Centennial Exhibition on Sundays, in opposition to the whole secularism of the country and a large portion of the Christian Church and the petition of nearly seventy thousand working-men, all legal voters, in the city of Philadelphia alone. Look, too, at the matter of libraries, museums, etc. The number of libraries, museums, art-galleries, reading-rooms, public or private, in all the country, that are open on Sundays as freely as on other days, can be counted, I suppose, on one's fingers. It is only a few years, and after a long contest with ecclesiastical Sabbatarianism, that the Boston Public Library has been opened on Sunday; and it is not yet fully open. Excepting that and the library at Worcester, are there any other public libraries in New England yet open on Sunday? Perhaps there are; but it certainly is not yet the general practice, nor one that is to be effected without considerable struggle with the old Sabbatarianism.

The Sunday laws, too, are not so dead as it is the fashion to allege them to be. They are very living and very potent, whenever bigotry, or malice, or regard for self-interest chooses to move for their enforcement. And this is not so infrequent as we are apt to think. The newspapers in one part of the country or another are pretty constantly reporting prosecutions for violations of Sunday laws, but they slip from the memory, and, because we do not see them in the aggregate, do not make the impression they should. It is only a few weeks ago that the Boston newspapers reported the case of a man who had been severely injured by an accident to a Sunday train in which he was travelling, on (I think) the Boston and Maine Railroad. The responsibility of the corporation for the accident was fully proved. But because the man could not show that he was travelling from "necessity or charity"—the only reasons for which our Massachusetts laws allow travelling on Sunday—he lost his case and did not get the sum for damages which by justice he should have received, and which for the same accident on the road on any other day he would have received. Mr. Pratt, at the Convention, mentioned a similar case, where a poor woman had met with a disabling injury on account of a defective highway. It was on Sunday; and though she was going to procure medicine for her sick child, the court held that this was not a work of "necessity or charity" in the meaning of the law, and that therefore she was not entitled to damages. This case went by appeal to the Massachusetts Supreme Court, which sent it back to the lower court, with the opinion that it was a case which might go to a jury with instructions to consider whether the errand on which the woman was going might not be regarded as a "work of charity." And so, after the anxiety and expense of three trials, this needy working-woman may possibly get remuneration. But, surely, it is not a useless object, nor one unworthy of earnest and philanthropic men, to try to do something to make such hardships and injustices as these impossible in an enlightened Commonwealth.

Or, again, even if it could be admitted that Sabbatarianism is dead, and that Sunday is practically a day of liberty, it is certainly a very important question, What is the best use that can be made of the day? Here is a seventh portion of our lifetime, rescued, it is claimed, from the power of superstition, and free by custom from the ordinary wearing toil of the other days. Now, how shall we use it for the best welfare of society? No one will venture to say that all the good the day is capable of is now got out of it in Christendom. And if the day has really become a free day, then all the more pressing is the question, By what methods and measures can it be made most helpful, especially among the classes that most need its opportunities, towards lifting men and women to a higher plane of living? And this was the question in which the discussions of the recent Boston Convention culminated. In my view, the Episcopal Congress, in session at the same time and three days more, discussed no question of greater practical moment, nor has any more important question been discussed by any religious body during the last year. How any earnest and humane man can dismiss it with indifference or with a sneer, passes my comprehension.

SATURDAY MORNING SESSIONS IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

At the Free Religious Association Convention on November 15, Rabbi Lasker made some remarks in regard to a feature of the public school system which were very earnest and very sincere, but which seemed to me to show a misapprehension of the relation of our secular school system to religious faiths and practices. As this question was not really appropriate to the discussion of the convention, it was well to pass it over in silence; but it seems to me a good text for a few remarks here.

Rabbi Lasker thought it a grievous wrong to have the public schools in session on Saturday morning. He based his objections on two grounds: first, that five days in the week of school attendance are better than six for the physical and intellectual welfare of the scholars; and, secondly, that a considerable number of Jewish children (about two thousand, he estimated) in Boston are thus hindered from keeping the Sabbath according to the rules of their Church.

These grounds are so entirely different, that we must consider them separately. The first offers a sufficient reason for giving up the Saturday morning session, if the school committees are convinced of its reasonableness; and in fact a very large proportion of the schools of the Commonwealth, both public and private, are now conducted upon this plan. Even some of the higher grades of the public schools in Boston have no session on Saturday morning. Without going into a full discussion of the merits of this question, I would say that my own conclusion is that, for the advanced schools of older children and for the welfare of teachers, the five days school plan is a good one; but that, for young children, the six days session, with two half holidays on Wednesday and Saturday, is better.

The other reason given is very different, and this question must be asked: Is the State, as represented by School Boards, bound to ask what are the religious practices of the pupils, and how must the school hours be arranged to suit them? It seems to me this is a thing wrong in theory and impossible in practice. The State has nothing whatever to do with the religious tenets of the pupils. It should know neither Greek nor Jew, Christian nor Mohammedan, Catholic nor Protestant. It would be involved in an endless discussion, if its rules must be conformed to the conscientious belief of its pupils. The Catholic and Episcopalian would demand exemption from school duties in Lent; the Congregationalist during revivals; the Mohammedans every Friday; and perhaps the Unitarians and Radicals on Anniversary week,—with the same reason that the Jews do on Saturday. If the School Board decides that two days of the week shall be without school sessions, it would be an excellent reason for selecting a day to be thus exempt that it suited the convenience of a majority or any large part of the pupils, whether for the purpose of going to the synagogue, the prayer-meeting or the dancing-school, the gymnasium or the theatre.

But another point was made by Rabbi Lasker: namely, that the parent had a right to keep his child from school in order to fulfil what he conceived to be a religious duty. Here he and the Catholic are right. This right of the parent is paramount to the claims of the school, not only when religious duty, but when considerations of health or the child's welfare demand its exercise. But the child must take the consequences. The pupil who is absent from school by reason of ill-health loses rank in consequence; it is inevitable, and is not a punishment for staying away, but a consequence of the fact. So the child who stays away at the command of his parent loses so much study and instruction, and must lose rank.

On Rabbi Lasker's plan, supposing the Saturday morning school to be an advantage, all the other thousands of children in Boston must lose that advantage for the accommodation of the two thousand Jews; and this is certainly as unjust to those who prize education as he claims the present arrangement to be to those who prize the Jewish Sabbath. If the child is arbitrarily deprived of rank as a punishment because he attends church or synagogue, that is persecution; but if he falls behind in his class because the other pupils study one-sixth more than he does, or if, the school authorities having decided that a certain number of absences per year are incompatible with good discipline, he is absent that number of times and so loses rank, he must simply choose between what he conceives to be the relative value of church and school privileges. It is very rarely that adherence to conscience does not cost something.

I wish to say that I have felt interested to answer these criticisms of Rabbi Lasker, because I think they were made in misunderstanding of the position of the schools on this point, and not in ill-will; and because I can bear most cordial testimony to the forbearance of the Jews in stirring up such questions, which the attitude of certain Christian sects gives them fair occasion to do, to the injury of the school system; and because I believe that there is no portion of our community more liberal, progressive, and philanthropic, and more sincerely interested in general education, than the cultivated and intelligent Jews whom it has been my good fortune to know.

I think we may confidently count upon them as valuable allies in the great movements of Free Religion and Secular education.

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY B. C.

Political affairs in South Carolina which excited so much attention and controversy prior to the election, have suddenly changed into a peculiar spectacular performance which, although containing many comic elements, may yet end as a very disagreeable tragedy. There being some question with regard to the powers of the Returning Board, the matter was referred for decision to the Supreme Court, which directed the Board to return the names of all persons who appeared to be elected according to the reports of the County Canvassers. While certain points with reference to the Board were in debate before the Supreme Court, the Board held a meeting, threw out the votes of two Democratic counties (on the ground, we believe, of irregular proceedings or intimidation at the polls), issued certificates of election to the Hayes electors, to the various State Representatives, and to all the Republican candidates for State offices (with the exception of the Governorship the vote for which is to be counted by the Legislature), and then adjourned sine die. This action of the Board was not only in direct violation of the orders of the Court, but, inasmuch as four of its members are Republican candidates for election to State office, assumes a very suspicious appearance of sharp practice. The failure, moreover, to issue certificates of election of the Representatives of the excluded counties alters the political character of the Legislature, so that instead of a Democratic it would have a Republican majority. The Supreme Court immediately ordered the arrest of all members of the Board, and, as we write, they are now in jail, subject to the order of the Court which has fined them $1500 each for contempt. The Court has also directed its clerk to issue certificates of election to the Representatives of the rejected counties. The Board justifies its action on the ground that the ten days to which its proceedings are limited by law were about to expire, and it was obliged therefore to finish its labors without waiting for the action of the Supreme Court, the authority of which, moreover, it denies. The Legislature meets this week, but whether it will be Republican or Democratic, whether it will declare Chamberlain or Hampton to be elected Governor, or whether it will split in two and the adherents of each endeavor to establish an independent Legislature, are matters with regard to which we hope to know more next week than this. Party papers of course are very decided in upholding the action of the Board upon one hand or the Court upon the other. We do not know which is legally right, but are sure that if Chamberlain can afford to be elected in this manner, Hampton certainly can well afford to be defeated.

The condition of the canvass in Louisiana is more deplorable, if possible, than in South Carolina, and upon this point we shall speak a few plain words at the risk of exciting the ire of party zealots. The Louisiana Returning Board is a thoroughly rotten concern. Two or three years ago some of its doings were thoroughly inquired into and reported upon by such prominent Republicans as Mr. Wheeler, Mr. W. W. Phelps, Mr. G. F. Hoar, and others. They were unanimous in condemnation of its proceedings, and unhesitatingly declared it guilty of fraud. This Board has no Supreme Court to wage war against it. With regard to the result of all elections, it is admitted to be the highest authority in the State. Its proceedings are judicial as well as clerical, and from its decisions there is no appeal. It is at present composed of three members—heaving steadily refused to fill vacancies,—one member being white and two members black, and is now counting the votes of the various parishes; taking up, first, those parishes in which there is no dispute with regard to the number of votes cast or the fairness of method with which the balloting was conducted. Last Friday morning it had finished the count of thirteen parishes, situated in various portions of the State. The Springfield Republican, which advocated the election of Hayes and Wheeler, has carefully compared the votes of these parishes with the votes of the same parishes in 1874, and finds that the ratio of Democratic gain therein, applied to the remaining parishes of the State, would show the vote of the State to be cast for Tilden by about eight thousand majority. Professor Sumner, of Yale College, who recently returned from a visit to New Orleans, states that he conversed with members of both parties while there, and found that nearly all agreed that the State had voted for Tilden by at least seven thousand majority; but nearly all agreed also that the Returning Board would manage in some way to give the State to Hayes. Mr. Ottendorfer, editor of the New York Staats Zeitung, a Democratic paper, fully agrees with the statement of Professor Sumner. Assuming that the State has voted for Tilden, it would be a comparatively easy matter, nevertheless, to give it to Hayes by throwing out the votes of four or five parishes in which it is claimed Republicans were prevented from voting, by violence or by some other means. These claims are stoutly denied by the Democrats, and both parties support their statements with any required number of affidavits. The counting of votes by the Board is witnessed by a committee composed of five Democrats and five Republicans; and admitting the possibility that the ultimate decision of the Board may meet the approbation of the entire committee, we do not suppose that any one believes this will be the case, but on the contrary that the finding of the Board, whether for Hayes or Tilden, will be received by indignant protests and charges of a dishonest count by a large part of the people of the country.

With the possibility before us, therefore, that our next President may be one whom many people will believe to have been dishonestly elected, we desire to state that, nevertheless, in our opinion, his election should be acquiesced in, if not with cheerfulness, at least with good faith; and by good faith in this connection we mean with a sincere intention to support him in all measures precisely as we should if we believed him to have been elected solely by righteous methods. General Grant has already said that no President can afford to be elected by fraud, an opinion to which all will heartily assent; but the nation, as a nation, can afford to have a President elected by fraud far better than it can afford to indulge in a period of anarchy, or even one of prolonged contention which might impair its credit abroad and be productive of increased intensity of party strife at home. Four years is not a long time in which to endure the presidency of any man or the fraudulent usurpations of any party, especially when we know well that the man who should step into the presidency by evident fraud would inevitably, with his party, be consigned to well-merited ignominy. The suggestions of many party papers that forcible resistance may be made to the inauguration of the next President, we look upon, therefore, as mischievous vagaries, to be frowned upon by all who sincerely desire the good of their country and not the temporary triumph of any one man or any one party; and only a little less mischievous, in our opinion, are the many schemes now publishing which point out the admitted constitutional defects by aid of which either House of Congress may contest the counting of the presidential vote and prevent a peaceful proclamation of the result. Although we should bitterly regret the choice of a President by an election, the fairness of which could not be universally conceded, we trust no one will forget that our country's welfare is infinitely more worthy of consideration than any regard for either Tilden or Hayes, and should not be endangered because of the temporary success of Returning Boards or scalawag politicians. These can exist, at most, but for a day; the nation is to exist, we hope, for unnumbered generations.

A more fearful catastrophe than any heretofore recorded in modern history recently occurred (Oct. 31st) along the eastern shore of Bengal, in Hindoetan. A violent hurricane or cyclone created an immense wave in the north-western part of the Indian Ocean, known as the Bay of Bengal, and this wave rolling in upon the land entirely submerged three large and numerous smaller islands lying in the estuary of the Megna River, which is, we believe, one of the numerous mouths of the famous Ganges River. The islands, one of which contained eight hundred square miles, are low and densely populated, and as the wave rolled in at midnight, surprising many in their beds and allowing but little opportunity for escape, the loss of life was unparalleled. The wave also submerged the main-land for a distance of some five or six miles inland. The number drowned is variously estimated at from one hundred and twenty-five thousand to over two hundred and fifty thousand persons.

An amusing squabble is taking place between the Protestant and Catholic chaplains of the Massachusetts State Prison. Until within a few years a single Protestant chaplain has had undisputed charge of the spiritual welfare of this large and attentive congregation of over seven hundred members. As about three hundred of these were Catholics, or, at least, of Catholic parentage and traditions, a Catholic priest has been allowed to try his skill upon the damaged souls who might be willing to accept his ministrations. Of course Catholic prayer-books were introduced, the Protestant Sunday-school lost some of its regular attendants, the confessional was established, and in short, the usual machinery of Catholic ministrations was duly set up,—and all, according to the unanimous opinion of wardens, inspectors, and prison officials, with much benefit apparently to the Catholic inmates. But the poor Protestant chaplain was greatly troubled by this Catholic success, and now comes out with a report which cannot be read without a smile by any one possessed of the slightest sense of humor, and which might have been written by J. D. Fulton or the immortal Talmage. He "pitches in" to the Catholics with a vim which is refreshing in these days of easy creeds, denounces their preaching and their practices, and evidently regards their success with the prisoners as secured by the wiles of the devil and as just cause for pious lamentation. The priest replies in a temperately written letter which, however, is not at all calculated to appease the anxious mind of his associate. We do not know what will be done with the two chaplains, but we pity the prisoners whose souls are to be cured by such antagonistic doses of theological gruel.

The excitement in Europe with regard to the probable outbreak of war between Russia and Turkey does not abate, and attention is now turned toward the coming Constantinople conference, which however may entirely fail to insure peace. Russia is undoubtedly preparing for war, and the Czar is determined to occupy Bulgaria for a time at least, in order to protect the Christians from Moslem violence during the initiation of the promised reforms. Turkey is perfectly willing to introduce reform in her system of administration, but positively refuses, thus far at least, to allow Russian soldiers to occupy Bulgaria; and points to an article in the Treaty of Paris which declares that the powers shall not interfere with the internal affairs of Turkey. Bismarck is not unwilling to permit Russia to march troops into Turkey, and although England opposes this demand of Russia she may finally assent to it under certain conditions. War or peace would then depend upon the stiffness of Turkish pride.

ENGLISH SKETCHES.

BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT.

LONDON, Nov. 11.

I shall go over to America. Not content with mobbing me at Hoyalnd, and brick-batting me at Gogleton, they have cayenne-peppered me at Armley! Do you ever try that curious trick in your half of the world? The modus operandi is as follows: you take some cotton waste, or tow, damp it well, and dip it thoroughly in cayenne pepper; then take it to the hall you want to operate upon, lay it outside the door, light it and run away. Presently a pungent odor diffuses itself through the room; people begin to cough, then choke, until naught can be heard but cough, cough, tchu, tchu, ugh, ugh, ugh! The lecturer struggles to go on—cough; gamely perseveres—gasp; still finish—emits a few melancholy gurgles, and subsides. Thus happened it at Armley. It was near the end of the lecture; my audience was gasping around me; "perorating" was impossible. I closed as quietly and quickly as I could, and choked demurely as I sat down. Discussion was not possible, and we promptly returned whither we came. There was a good deal of indignation, but it was choked down. On the whole, brickbats have one point in their favor; you can argue with a mob, but you can't argue against pepper.

per, and it is so hard to look dignified when you are choking. The only comfort is that when people resort to pepper, they must clearly be at the end of their arguments. Seriously speaking, it is sad to see that we are not yet beyond this kind of annoyance; it shows so much ignorance, so much narrowness, so much brutality. A man I met the day following this business told me that he had been ill all night from the effects of it; and many of the women there would probably suffer from it for a day or two. It often makes one sad at least to know how much there is yet to be done before we can pretend to civil and religious liberty, much as we boast ourselves thereupon in England.

There is an amusing little article in a French newspaper on the omission of prayers in the opening of the National Assembly. M. Edouard Lockroy remarks:—

"La session qui vient de s'ouvrir a quelque chose de particulier et d'effrayant: elle est privée de prières publiques. C'est la première fois depuis 1871 que les Assemblées délibèrent sans avoir appelé la bénédiction du ciel sur leurs travaux. On se demande avec terreur ce que cette omission va produire de cataclysmes."

M. Lockroy fears terrible things; M. de Gavardie will no longer leave at half-past four; and M. de Belcastel may forget all about reestablishing the inquisition. Everything is possible; heaven has not been warned that the Chamber is again at work, and will not have inspired the representatives of the nation. The novelty of this situation may even give some good sense to the right, and patriotism to the Bonapartists. But there is one benefit to be looked for; for here is a chance of estimating the efficacy of prayers for parliament:—

"Il est évident que, si des scènes de désordre se produisent; si, par exemple, les sénateurs se mettent à danser le cancan; si les bratards montent à la tribune en caleçon de bain; si, au milieu d'une discussion de finance, les députés entonnent en chœur l'Amant d'Amanda, il faudra bien reconnaître que l'omission des prières publiques aura eu un résultat fâcheux. Il faudra même proposer de les rétablir dans l'intérêt des Chambres, de la République et de la nation."

Further, M. Lockroy complains that the prayers are addressed only to the God of the Catholics, so that if they are of any use, the Catholics "se trouvent donc seuls inspirés, et cela condamne les autres à une infériorité véritablement regrettable. Mais comme, d'autre part, grand les Catholiques inspirés paient, ils paient comme M. Duteuple ou comme M. Lorgier, leur style fait douter de l'inspiration divine et de l'efficacité des prières." Clearly, the National Assembly prayers do not redound to the glory of God.

You know how very doubtful our courts of law are about the personal existence of his royal highness the prince of the power of the air. Some four hundred of his imps have just been giving clear proof of their activity and continued life. The Barcelona correspondent of the Times, relates a wonderful story, worth preserving as a curiosity of the nineteenth century. He writes:—

"About the 14th or 15th of this present month of October it was privately announced, chiefly to the faithful women of the congregation which regularly throngs the Church of the Holy Spirit, in the street of San Francisco, that a young woman of seventeen or eighteen years of age, of the lower class, having long been afflicted with 'a hatred of holy things'—the poor girl probably was subject to epileptic fits, and cried out and became convulsed when she heard the notes of the organ in church,—the senior priest of the church above mentioned would cure her of her disease; or, to use that gentleman's own language, 'Avaunt, physicians and mountebanks; see how the Church will cure this poor girl, who is at present possessed with four hundred devils.'"

A large number of the faithful assembled to see the power of God revealed by the casting out of the devils, and all preparations had been duly made for the spectacle:—

"Within the little enclosure or sanctuary, separated from the crowd by a light railing, lay on a common bench, with a little pillow for her head to recline upon, a poorly-clad girl, probably of the peasant or artisan class; her brother or husband stood at her feet to restrain her (at times) frantic kicking by holding her legs. The door of the vestry opened; the exhibitor—I mean the priest—came in. The poor girl, not without just reason, 'had an aversion to holy things,' or, at least, the four hundred devils within her distorted body had such an aversion; and in the confusion of the moment, thinking that the father was 'a holy thing,' she doubled up her legs, screamed out with twitching mouth, her breast heaving, her whole body writhing, and threw herself nearly off the bench. The male attendant seized her legs, the women supported her head and swept out her dishevelled hair."

The priest then delivered an oration, announcing his intention, and, this over, "turning to the prostrate, shuddering, most unhappy object of his attack, the priest commenced, 'In the name of God, of the saints, of the blessed Host, of every holy sacrament of our Church, I adjure thee, Rusbel, come out of her.' (N. B.—'Rusbel' is the name of a devil, the devil having two hundred and fifty-seven names in Catalonia.) Thus addressed, the girl threw herself in an agony of convulsion, till her distorted face, foam-bespattered lips, and writhing limbs grew well-nigh stiff, at full length upon the floor, and, in language semi-obscene, semi-violent, screamed out, 'I don't choose to come out, you thieves, scamps, robbers.' 'Fulfill your promise, Rusbel,' said the priest. 'You said yesterday you would cast one hundred more of your cursed spirits out of this most hapless girl's body. Can't you speak?' 'Yes, I can,' came, from the poor girl's foaming lips, 'I can.' 'Yes,' said the cura, 'you are a devil of honor; you are a man of your word.'

This extraordinary scene went on for some time, and at last the devil consented to come out by the mouth of the girl. The priest refused to allow this, because one hundred devils coming out of her mouth would suffocate her. Then he demanded that she should be undressed, that they might pass through her body. This also the priest would not permit. Then the devils said they would go out through her right foot; the sandal was untied, the foot gave a kick, and the devils were expelled. Some more of the four hundred were to be exorcised on the following day, but the civil authorities interfered and put a prompt end to the scandal. The conclusion reminds one of the famous decree—when miracles were creating a public disturbance—"Défense à Dieu de faire miracles ou se lieu." One wonders when people will outgrow the manifold follies of superstition. After all, is this more silly, although more repulsive, than "Dr." Slade or "Dr." Monck, who employ spirits to rap, pinch, and scribble for their profit?

VIEWS OF A SOUTHERN WOMAN.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In looking over the column of "Current Events," in THE INDEX of October 12, and the letter of Harold Frederic in same issue, I was struck by your appearance, as the first intimation given in your just paper that there are "two sides," to this "outrage question."

"W. J. P.'s" article, "Justice, not Partisanship," and "Current Events," in the following INDEX, all grouped together, call forth this statement from one Southerner broad-minded enough to see the thing in its true light. Your publication of "Slade's Defence," the "Current Events," and the letter from the "Servant of Christ," speak handsomely of your true journalistic and non-partisan spirit. Your sympathies are with none of these, but you give them fair hearing.

In the outset I shall state I am a Southern woman by birth, brought up by a slave-holding Virginian, and owned slaves all my life until the war. My father despised slavery in every form, and winked at my teaching his own slaves to read, despite the law. He was beloved by all of them. In advance of his time he was an advocate of "woman's rights," and taught me to hate her wrongs as well as to comprehend them; and I am certain my children have blessed the fact that I was rocked in a heterodox cradle by the hand of a man.

My father was a Union man, until the outrages of Union soldiers caused him to forsake his desolated home in Arkansas, and take arms in the Confederate cause. You of the North can know nothing of what it was to be a Union man in the Southern States at that time. Arrested and incarcerated as a prisoner in the Irving Block in Memphis, he died there, holding no bitterness in his heart, and accepted every misfortune as a result of war. His last words to me commended a faithful slave; and that woman to-day shares my heart and purse, dear as those tied by blood and love. I have passed many years in the North, and sympathize with any true-hearted abolitionist there; but my position gives me an advantage here, and my life has borne witness to my truth. I spent the past summer in a town near Buffalo. My nurse, a negro-girl, attended a colored people's picnic there. On her return home she said to me: "Mrs. Saxon, two men, one white and one colored, made speeches, and said that the colored people were not allowed any freedom in the South, and they could not have picnics, and were butchered without mercy in both Louisiana and other Southern States." I asked: "Well, Emma, is it true?" "Why," she cried in astonishment, "no; seven hundred of them chartered the Prytania Cass the day we left there to go to a picnic; they do nothing else but frolic; that is one reason half of them are so poor now."

After the Coshatta murder of two years ago, planters for ninety miles up and down Red River were arrested, only a short time before the election, and held in durance until after it was over, on suspicion alone. Their employés voted the Republican ticket to a man, swearing that they did so from the simple fact of fear. The same parties who told the farmers they were prisoners told their servants they would be served likewise if they dared vote otherwise. Ignorant, credulous, timid from long servitude, who wonders at their course! My cook, a negro woman, had a son who voted the Democratic ticket two years ago, and was mobbed and beaten by his own race. I saw cards containing threats of similar treatment that negroes had received. My sympathy is with the negro. No other race suddenly freed could have acted better; few so well. Their Union Aid Societies have been a bond of union for them, a protection from want, and a great help to the impoverished cities by keeping them off charity lists.

So much for the present, as I now see it. When the war closed, I was living, and had been for two years, in the subjugated city of Memphis, Tenn. I saw that the greed of gain had outstripped patriotism in the hearts of officers and men, and to make money in any way was the prevailing desire of all, Northern and Southern alike. Men filled with a fanatical idea of the negroes' wrongs, their hearts all on fire with good-will to them, taught them that as a race they owed revenge, and painted wrongs in glowing colors that they had never endured save in isolated cases. I am not whitewashing a system that I hated. I am too earnest an advocate of freedom for woman to do this. But cases of personal cruelty in great degree were the exception, and not the rule, just as in marriage. Mad and furious at their defeat, our people threw off their faithful adherents,—in many instances with wanton cruelty, in many it was enforced. It was hard to make a woman comprehend that the simple fact of freedom made her a homeless wanderer, or to convince her the change was enforced by a law she could not in any way comprehend. A slave woman and her children were property; they had a money value, and money could be raised on them at any time, as on any other salable thing. By her freedom she was valueless, and her work could not feed, clothe, and house these helpless swarms of little ones; and so with tears of anguish, many homes were cleared of long attached slaves.

Coming to Mobile I urged upon the people there to anticipate this influx of a Northern body of teachers, hostile to us from long prejudice and religious teachings,—that it was the duty of our people to educate our former slaves, making them our tried friends, as they were from climate, nature, and training our natural allies and employés. Our people met all such proposals with scorn, and fancied the negro would instantly burst all bonds, and demand and enforce equality.

Some of our men were wise enough to affiliate with the incoming power, and save something of our former prestige by so doing. Many of our people met this move with hostility, and ostracized both the Republicans (as they termed them) and the Southerners who tried to save even this "half loaf" in their desperate need. Mad as such policy was, it was persevered in until many good Northern men, too tender to keep their families here, sent them or carried them back. The Southerner shrank from a condition so painfully humiliating for his family. I have ever firmly believed that Gen. Longstreet, in the beginning of his career after the war, felt that no man familiar with his record could doubt his patriotism, or impugn his motives, and that his example would give those of less renowned valor the courage to step forward in so needed a reform, and that good men who had accepted the condition in good faith would sustain his course. No! our fools among women cried out: "I will despise you if you vote with the negro." Naturally you of the North must look for officers to fill places of trust among your own adherents and the colored race. I urged and pleaded with my friends to look ten years ahead, and reckon up what such mad policy was to bring about; but truly—"whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad."

This system of ostracizing good men, if they identified themselves with our conquerors and made effort to share in civil government, brought about its natural result. Many among our most useful and honest men had by rebellion lost the right of suffrage, and could only look on with tied hands.

Naturally a floating, thriftless population, with nothing to lose either in means or character, came forward, ready to share the spoils. Good men from the North retired in disgust from the field, leaving the scum of both sides to partition between them the spoils of our dismembered States. Many, in a few years, seeing the great mistake, strove again to enter the arena, and save something of power and honor from the wreck. It was too late; the corrupt leaders had seized upon the negro, and used him, until they had wielded a sword that cut both ways. Suddenly set free from toil, idleness was their glory, and from among this generation will come the food to glut the prisons. You rarely find the former slave therein; it is the children born in bondage, and grown up since the war. I questioned over forty women in the Parish prison, and found not one among them thirty years of age.

Suddenly set free, like too many, they thought freedom was license, used obscene language, were violent in their demonstrations, often resenting fancied insults with open violence. Naturally the long dominant race felt no sympathy, never paused to assume "his place," and so hated with a will. Yet to-day, after this turbid water of race-strife has slowly settled, the law-abiding negro finds his truest sympathizer and warmest friend among the former masters.

I live on a street where the principal owners are wealthy, and nearly all of Northern birth. Two-thirds of them, or more, employ white labor; myself and one other, Southerners, employ negroes entirely, and pay the best of wages. My husband, a South Carolinian, had (and still has) during the League power, nine negro men employed; he refused to discharge them. On the memorable 14th of September not one drop of negro blood was shed, yet the dominant race of the South held complete control for twenty-six hours. Weary of all I have represented, in brief our people are in despair. Our most useful men are having their hopes destroyed and lives ruined by the mad policy that prevails. The negro sees that the incoming Northerner, unused to his thriftless ways, hires Pat and Bridget. The Southerner is impoverished, and can lend no aid. So between the two our poor unfortunate sits down to meditate in gloomy despondency. Some among them, astute, clear-headed, however unlearned in books, counsel together and conclude to have "a new order of things," to vote with the Democrats, and try a change, assured that, if the threat of enslavement be true, Uncle Sam will send bayonets down to their first cry for help. Naturally, the Republicans regard the negro as their lawful adherent; was not his freedom won by their valor? Is he not the spoil of their "bow and spear"? He cannot see how the negroes dare change their allegiance, and becomes mad with rage at the assumed insult to friendship.

Those fortunate enough to hold office desire still to retain it, by the vote of his weak, ill-used, but earnest-hearted brother. The Republican party here is not the Republican party of the North; Mr. Abbot, although there are some few good, true men among the motley crew. Personally, I am in sympathy with the Republican government; it has made vast progress under the mighty shadow of the war-cloud. Free from this and the corruption engendered by war results, it can be a glorious party, and it will. They freed the negro; they will free woman; though they hold out to her no hand of hope, they have ceased to sneer at her claim, or mock her protest. The Democratic party is anchored in a Jeffersonian Eden of the past, non-progressive, and have a staked-out circle they denominate "woman's sphere," in which she bears the babies, mends their clothes, feeds their lust and stomachs,—"chronicles Church small-beer, and suckles fools" to grow up more bigoted than their sires. I fear the change, and yet the same corrupt ring that environed Grant will surround Hayes.

A more terrible danger lies in the fact that the consolidation of Protestant sects means mischief. The love of the Christian is a death-dealing instrument, and the element lies largely within Republican ranks. Our greatest safety lies in the intense hatred that has long animated the sects; they are united in only one thing—hatred to the Catholic. In the near future it will be a mighty cement indeed, and array two mad, unreasoning elements in a hand-to-hand struggle.

If the Governor of Louisiana can be a Democrat, it would be better for her that Hayes occupied the Chair of Chief Magistrate, for as a Western man he would scarcely fight against the interest of his own section. Their interest as a grain-producing people is identical with ours, holding as we do the outlet to the mighty stream on whose banks they live. Too poor to do without Federal appropriation, to render these waters available, we do well to weigh the matter now. In any event our people are in a deplorable condition, misruled and misjudged by one-half the nation's best adherents. Oppressive rule is awful. Witness the attesting facts of our neglected and empty houses, our unoccupied merchants, the languishing trade. My dwelling two years ago cost me sixteen thousand dollars; to-day it would not bring seven thousand, if a purchaser could be found at all. Nor is this alone the case here. Witness the mighty grain elevators, lying idle, that were once busily employed in Buffalo; the numberless unoccupied business houses for rent in other Northern business centres. All this is the result of the mighty cancer that is eating the life from one-third of the Union—"In it, but not of it." We fought to get out of the Union; how can we get back? We are down, and yet you say, accept. Why, you can't conceive what you are saying, unless you were in our midst, a resident for years as I have been. I offer you no partisan views, and frankly say: "Here is a Gordian knot, and I fear it is so tied about our body politic that it will be cut as the one was by Alexander, and in the end a war of religion as well as races be upon us."

I have my ideas of reform that I suppose men would sneer at. Nevertheless one thinks, despite the sneer of Cæsar. Ingersoll truly says: "Never can men be true nor great, so long as babies lie in women's laps, and they kneel before the twin-born devils, fear and faith." To me the emancipation of women from priestly rule is a nobler mission than all beside; for the elevation of the female sex is the glorious exaltation of the male.

Yours fraternally,
E. L. SAXON.

NEW ORLEANS, November 3, 1876.

HEATHEN HONESTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I cut from the Celestial Empire of the 23d September last, the leading paper owned by Englishmen in Shanghai, China, and conducted in the interest of foreigners, the following editorial notice of a trifling incident which, like straws, show which way the wind blows. Remember as you read it that these people (the Chinese) are they to whom the Christian world send missionaries to instruct them in the right theology, and to teach them what is right and what is wrong. Surely these heathen, if they could read about our safe burglaries, our whiskey rings, Belknap, Babcock, Schenck & Co., might turn upon the missionaries and say: "Physician! Heal thyself."

Nov. 15, 1876.

"It was curious to notice on the Bund the other morning, a string of wheelbarrows laden with large bricks of solid bar silver, being placidly trundled along by coolies. Nobody was near to see that the treasure, which was loosely enough secured, arrived at its destination safely. Of course there is no doubt that it did so arrive; but there are few countries where one could see a familiar sight,—sons, almost, of precious metal piled on ordinary conveyances of the most primitive description, and treated with about as much caution as if it were a cartload of bricks. And yet it was safe enough. Fancy such a thing being attempted in the streets of London!"

THEN, AGAIN, baths may almost affect a religious character. Free Church clergymen affect Strathpeffer, the Dissenters are in their element at Llandrindod, while the Irish priest is in his full glory at Lisdoonvarna. We even find a hill-station in the Tyrol, Obiadis, recommended as particularly suited for Ultramontanes, where Northern Germans need not show themselves, although the society is represented as one happy family quite tolerant of differences. Somewhat different are baths in the south of Germany, or at the miracle-working well of Lourdes. It is also noteworthy that there is a strong religious element in many English hydropathic establishments.—Curative effects of Baths and Waters, by Braun.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
 " 13 " 25 " 8 " "
 " 26 " 51 " 6 " "
 " 52 " " 5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 30, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers. Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEPHENS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

Office, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON,
 has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
 WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-ly, N.J.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large. And later still 'I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest.'"

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to seats and vote in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to vote, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

VOLUME 7.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1876.

WHOLE No. 363.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrine of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

CARDINAL ANTONELLI is said to have left behind him a fortune of $10,000,000. How to account for it is now the perplexing problem.

THERE ARE SAID TO BE OVER A THOUSAND Young Men's Christian Associations in North America, with an average membership of one hundred and ten, and an aggregate property of $2,125,418.

THE HEBREW ORDER OF B'nai B'rith unveiled their statue of Religious Liberty on the Centennial Grounds at Philadelphia, on November 30. The artist is Mr. M. Ezekiel, of Cincinnati, whose work has been highly praised.

FROM A long article in the Detroit Post of November 19, it appears that the "Radical Democracy," which has expressed entire sympathy with the Liberal League movement, voted an independent ticket at the late election in several places.

THIS DROLL SUGGESTION of a correspondent is referred to the United States Chief of Engineers: "Now that Hell Gate has been blown up on Sunday, I wish that General Newton would excavate the American Alliance, and blow it up on Saturday."

ONE OF Mr. Moody's converts at Chicago, being a fugitive from justice, started back to deliver himself up to the authorities, expecting a sentence of ten years in the State prison. What a blessed thing it would be for the country just now if the revivalist would do as much for the politicians of both parties!

IT IS proposed by the Italian Ministry to appropriate the Vatican to the State, and break up the semblance of temporal sovereignty kept up by the Pope within its walls. Such a measure might induce the old gentleman to emigrate; and Father Becker's device of setting up his throne at Jerusalem may come to pass after all.

THE BAPTIST Watchman is disturbed at what it calls "Scientific Vaticanism," and thinks that Huxley is no more infallible than the "very small wood-bird." True enough; but the question is one of competency, not infallibility, and it is no proof of competency for a tyro to dispute with an eminent specialist in his own department.

THE NEW YORK Tribune says that in that city "the annual rental of some pews is equal to the house-rent of a family of moderate means. . . . In many churches the custom of sub-letting is in vogue, and in some cases it is made the source of profit to the pew-holder." What a precious justification of the exemption of churches from taxation!

"In a general conversation a few days ago," wrote a subscriber in a recent letter, "I made the remark that the disciples, no doubt, failed to understand Jesus in many of his teachings. One of my shop-mates, who is much like Pat's owl ('says little, but thinks much') said: 'Yes—then the disciples did not understand Jesus; now Jesus does not understand the disciples.' Hawley!!"

NO CITIZEN who values free institutions can fail to be moved by a profound anxiety as to the outcome of the present political embarrassment. The temptations to fraud in manipulating the election returns are so evident, and the public dangers of any such course are so enormous, that partisanship ought to be wholly swallowed up in patriotism. "Counting in" anybody as President in such a way as to leave the people convinced that he is really a usurper would do more to destroy republican government in this country than open, armed rebellion. Let us all be fixed in one purpose—to throw whatever influence we possess, be it little or great, on the side of an honest, dispassionate, non-partisan settlement of this grave Presidential question.

THERE is no little force in these statements of the Examiner: "It is often said, and with a good deal of justice, that the scepticism of our time is more thoughtful and more fair to Christianity than that of the last century. Its teachers and exemplars include men of high aims and estimable characters. They give no ground for the old charge of alliance between infidelity and immorality. Their discussions of the subject are in the tone of men who love truth, and who reject Christianity because they do not see it to be truth. But the more malignant form of unbelief is not obsolete, and the mild and respectable type tends constantly to degenerate into it. The calm and lofty denial of the gospel is usually connected with a sanguine persuasion that the superstition is dying out, and, indeed, almost ready for burial. Because it is discredited in their coterie, the sceptics assume that all men of sense have renounced, or will very soon renounce their faith in it. But the facts do not conform to their expectation. The Bible is still preached and believed, churches continue strong and draw in multitudes from the world, and the illumination of freethinking is making progress very slowly, if at all. Impatience is very likely to move something like anger at the impotence of what seemed so mighty to overthrow 'the old faith.'"

THE Nation suggests that any one of the Hayes electors, by casting his vote for Bristow in the Electoral College, could turn the disputed election into a mere failure to elect, and thereby perhaps save the country from civil war by securing the undisputed election of Tilden. It reminds the country that the original plan of the founders of the government was that the electors should exercise their independent judgment, and calls upon them now to resume this independence of which they have been deprived. It says, truly enough: "If, indeed, any member of one of those colleges were under such circumstances [as now exist] to exercise the right of private judgment, though actuated by the loftiest and purest motives, he would probably be roundly denounced as a traitor, and compared with Arnold and Judas." Very likely, and not without abundant justification. The purpose of "exercising the right of private judgment" would have been announced before election by any man not a "traitor." After he has been nominated and elected to vote for certain candidates, he has in honor concluded a contract with his constituents to cast that vote; and he would deserve all the reprobation intimated, if he were to follow the Nation's astounding suggestion. Does the way to reform in politics lie through the brazen violation of contracts? Or is a possible fraud only to be escaped by an actual one?

RESOLUTION

ADOPTED BY THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,
 AT PHILADELPHIA, JULY 2, 1876.

Resolved, That we accept the offer of the Boston INDEX to be our official organ of communication with the public, for the publication of announcements, acknowledgments, and other official papers of the Board of Directors; but that we assume no responsibility for anything else published in its columns and claim no control or influence in its general editorial management.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

Sunday Observance.

OF

THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

HELD AT BETHOVEN HALL, BOSTON, NOVEMBER 15, 1876.

The President then said:—
 LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: At the great festival held in Philadelphia to celebrate the adoption of the United States Constitution, it must not be forgotten that the Jewish and the Christian clergymen walked together in the procession, as a distinct recognition from the founders of our then new-born government, that it was based on principles of perfect religious equality,—not toleration, but equality, which is better. And we must all have felt, I am sure, during Dr. Lasker's address, that he spoke to us, not merely as the representative of the ancient religion to which he belongs, arguing for the special views of that, but that he rose to the broader attitude of an American citizen, claiming that this nation shall be now, what it assumed to be in the beginning, based upon secular, not upon religious, grounds. Is there anyone in the audience who would like to make any remarks upon the subject suggested by the written essay, or by the remarks of Dr. Lasker? If so, opportunity is given and the platform is offered to him. We should be very glad to hear from any of the audience. If no one is quite prepared to do so, we will afford additional material, and some further texts for consideration, by calling upon the Rev. Mr. Savage, of this city, who will address you in regard to "The History of Sunday Observance."

Mr. Savage then spoke as follows:—
 THE HISTORY OF SUNDAY OBSERVANCE.

BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

Fortunately, or unfortunately, I am obliged to talk my essay this morning instead of reading it. I have been so busy since I knew that I was to take some of your time this morning, that I have been unable to find time to write it; so that the manuscript I have in my hand is simply copies of quotations which I wish to read, and wish to be correct about. Before beginning the essay proper, and perhaps as an introduction to it, I wish to say that, if I were discussing the best use of Sunday, I might put myself on the ground where I should find a large part of the Orthodox clergy of Boston in substantial agreement with me. I certainly am not in favor of the abolition of Sunday. Just as we need some time to devote to our material welfare, so we need some time to devote to our religious welfare. If you should find a man in Boston who professed to be about his business seven days in the week, and yet you should be unable to catch him at it on any particular one of the seven days, you would have a suspicion that it was not looked after very closely. So I believe that people who look after their religious affairs always, and never do it at any particular time, leave them somewhat neglected, to say the least.

I have come here, then, simply in the interest of what seemed to me true. I came across a little passage from the Rev. H. R. Haweis, of London, an English churchman, which seemed to me capitally qualified to be my text. It is simply this: "It is better to be true than to seem good." Whether I be taken to be good this morning or not, by those who have certain ideas concerning Sunday, I am very anxious, at any rate, that I should be true; and I shall be careful scrupulously to state that which is true and nothing else.

My topic, as I understand it, is to give some account of what Sunday has actually been since the closing of the New Testament record; that is, Sunday in the Church. If we go back to the founding of the Church, we find that the most marked feature of that age, so far as the Church itself is concerned, is the grand division between the "Jewish faction," as it was called, and the followers of Paul. This division was so deep, so marked, so characteristic, that it has left its trace all through the New Testament itself. It was one of the grand aspects of the time, and the point on which they were divided was simply this: the followers of Peter, those who adhered to the teachings of the Central Church in Jerusalem, held that all Christians, both converted Jews and Gentiles, were under obligation to keep the Mosaic law, ordinances, and traditions. That is, a Christian, according to their definition, was first a Jew; Christianity was something added to that, not something taking the place of it. We find this controversy raging violently, all through the early churches, and splitting them into factions, so that they were the occasion of prayer and counsel. Paul took the ground distinctly that Christianity, while it might be spiritually the lineal successor of Judaism, was not Judaism; and that he who became a Christian, whether a converted Jew or Gentile, was under no obligation whatever to keep the Jewish law, so far as it was separate from practical matters of life and character. We find this intimated in the writings of Paul, two or three passages of which I have here, but which have been quoted already in Mr. Whipple's essay; for we have to go to the New Testament to find the origin of that which, we find, existed immediately after the New Testament book was written. Paul says: "One man esteemeth one day above another; another man esteemeth every day alike." He leaves it an open question; they can do as they please. [Romans xiv., 5-6.] Then: "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain." [Gal. iv., 10, 11.] And if you will note this Epistle of Paul to the Galatians, you will find that the whole purpose of his writing it was to protest against what he believed to be the viciousness of the Judaizing influences. That is, he says: "I have come to preach to you the perfect truth, that Christ hath made us free; and you are going back and taking upon yourselves this yoke of bondage. My labor is being thrown away; my efforts have been in vain." Then he says, in this celebrated Epistle to the Colossians, that has never yet been explained away or met: "Let no man therefore judge you any more in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days" [Col. ii., 16, 17],—distinctly abrogating the binding authority of the Sabbath on the Christian Church. So that, if Paul's word anywhere means anything, if his authority is to be taken as of binding force on any point whatever, then Paul is to be regarded as authoritatively and distinctly abrogating the Sabbath, and declaring that it is no longer binding on the Christian Church.

I hinted, a moment ago, at a council. We find that this breach in the early Church, this controversy, resulted at last in Paul's going up to Jerusalem to meet James and the representatives of the Jerusalem Church, to see if they could find any common platform of agreement,—if they could come together so that they could work with mutual respect and without any further bickering. What is the platform that they met upon? It was distinctly understood that those who wished to keep up the observance of Judaism should do so, and the Church at Jerusalem gave Paul this grand freedom, substantially saying to him: "Go back to your missionary work, found churches, and teach them that they are perfectly free in regard to all Mosaic and Jewish observances, save only these four: 'Abstain from pollutions of idols, from fornication, from things strangled, and from blood.'" [Acts xv., 20.] The point I wish to ask your attention to is that the question of Sabbath-keeping is one of those that is left out. The point that Paul had been fighting for was conceded by the central church at Jerusalem, and he was to go out thenceforth free, so far as that was concerned, in his teaching of the churches that he should found.

You have already heard that there is no mention of the Sabbath, or the Lord's day, as binding in the New Testament. What, then, was the actual condition of affairs? What did the churches do in the first three hundred years of their existence? Why, they did just what Paul and the Jerusalem church had agreed upon. Those who wished to keep the Jewish Sabbath did so; and the Judaizing faction, and the converts from the Gentiles, both, were accustomed to meet together some time, morning or evening, on the first day of the week, and to hold their public religious services to celebrate the resurrection of Jesus, and to eat together the Lord's Supper. But there appears nowhere any least, slightest, smallest hint, that on this day they were to abstain from labor, or that they were to be hindered in doing anything they pleased, or going anywhere they pleased,—that is, there is no trace of their confounding this first day of the week with the Jewish Sabbath. The Judaizing faction kept both; they kept the Jewish Sabbath, and they also met the other Christian brethren on the Lord's day. The Gentiles simply met on the Lord's day, and usually left the Jewish Sabbath entirely on one side. This, I say, is the fact of history.

There are one or two things I wish to speak of in connection with this, before passing to the next point,—two or three omissions, well-known, which are very significant. The writers of the New Testament, in several places, catalogue at length all kinds of sins and offences against Christian character. They are so long, so exhaustive, that it is apparent, on the part of the writer, that he wishes substantially to cover the whole ground. Now it is very remarkable that nowhere is there any mention of Sabbath-keeping, of Sunday-keeping, of Lord's day-keeping, as binding; and that nowhere any fault is found with anybody for neglecting to keep any of these days. Now if you remember that a large part of the Christian Church were converted heathen, people who had been swept in under the influence of the preaching of the apostles, who were not at all accustomed to keep any such day, who had no idea of it, you would suppose that that would be one of the first points in which they would most likely step over Christian observance, providing that that was a Christian observance. Yet there is no trace of it anywhere.

One other thing, which is more conclusive than this. During the persecutions under the Emperors of the Roman Empire, during the first centuries of Christianity, we know that this was true: that there were sons and daughters of heathen tyrants who were Christians,—there were officers in the Roman army,—there were common soldiers in the Roman army,—those representing all its ranks from the lowest to the highest,—who were Christians. There were members of Caesar's household in Rome, even, who were Christians,—Christians at a time when to be known as a Christian was certain death; and yet they were able for weeks, and months, and years to keep perfectly secret the fact of their Christianity. Consider for a moment how utterly impossible any such concealment would have been, if they had felt themselves bound to keep every seventh day after some certain public fashion, as an observance of Christian rules and laws. Particularly if this was a distinguishing mark of Christianity, and they were under obligation to keep it publicly as the Christians' Lord's day, not a single one of these men or women or children would have been able to conceal their Christianity for more than six days at a time. Yet they did conceal it for weeks, and months, and years; and a striking thing is that there is no apology from anybody for being under obligation to conceal it to save his life. There is no dispensation on the part of the Church permitting it to be done; there is no explanation of it; there is no mention of it at all. This seems to be a pretty conclusive argument that the thing never was thought of as binding, during the times of this persecution on the part of the Roman emperors.

The first legislation we come to on this subject very naturally is under Constantine, because Christians, not having gained recognition until this time, they had no power, if they wished, to make or enforce any legislation. But when we come to the year 321, we find this edict of Constantine. I have not found a translation of it, except one that I have made myself. It is a very free translation. If any of you should accuse me, after I have read it, of not knowing much about Latin, I shall do as a certain class of politicians do, when they have been caught stealing; I shall fall back on the fact that my "heart is sound on the main question" [laughter], and offer no other excuse. The edict is dated in the year 321, and is substantially as follows:—

"Let all judges and inhabitants of cities, and all craftsmen, rest on the venerable day of the sun. But countrymen may freely and lawfully attend to the cultivation of the fields, lest by delay the opportunity granted by the favor of heaven should be lost; seeing that it frequently happens that the grain and the vine cannot be so fitly planted on any other day."

The manumission of slaves, however, was excepted from this sweeping edict, that the judges should be free from all labor and occupation on that day. One or two points about this I would like to have you notice. In the first place, Constantine does not say anything about the Lord's day, or Sunday. Everybody admits that he means that day which we call Sunday to-day; but when you remember that Constantine, at the best, after all his white-washing, was rather a poor kind of Christian, and when we remember that he was a worshipper of the sun, an adherent of the old Pagan religion, before he found it for his interest to adopt and patronize Christianity,—it is a question how much love for the Lord's day is to be found in this edict. And then it is very strange, if there was any general public opinion on the part of the Church that it was wicked to do any work on Sunday,—it is very strange that he should have made this grand exception, leaving all countrymen free to go about their daily avocations. And it is very strange, if he believed the Almighty God has absolutely forbidden all labor on this day,—it is very strange, I say, that he should make such a curious reference as he does, when he says that countrymen are permitted to go about their daily avocations, "lest by delay the opportunity granted by the favor of heaven should be lost"; as if the very heaven, that had forbidden such a use of the day, was liable to give them special opportunities and chances to do their work, in direct contravention of its own orders and law!

Additions were made to this edict under various emperors. In the year 425, under Theodosius II., games and theatrical exhibitions were first forbidden; in 528, the third council of Orleans forbid all labor on Sunday. We find this, then, is a fact, that up to the time of Constantine even courts were held, and all the usual work of the city, as well as of the country, went on; after his time, half a century or more, agricultural labor still went on as usual; only in 425 were theatres forbidden; and in 528, for the first time, all labor. This, then, for the legislation.

I come now (and this is some of the most important testimony I have to offer you), I come to consider the opinion of certain great fathers on this subject. Of course, they being accounted in their time, Orthodox, standard authorities, and being so accounted still, cannot be accused of having any bias or prejudice in the matter. They must have known what were the actual practices, and they must have been aware as to what was the ideal practice which the Church demanded and desired. I give you only a few specimens. In the year 345, after Constantine's edict I wish you to notice, St. Cyril Bishop of Jerusalem, says this; and you will notice that it is implied that his Christian followers were inclined to turn out of the really true way of Christianity and go after their old ideas, just as Paul found his inclined. He says: "Turn thou not out of the way to Samaritanism or Judaism, for Jesus Christ hath redeemed thee. Henceforth reject all observance of Sabbaths, and call not meats which are really matters of indifference, common or unclean."

This is St. Cyril, twenty or thirty years after Constantine's edict. In the year 392, still later, St. Jerome (pretty good ancient authority) says: "On the Lord's day, they went to church; and, returning from church, they would apply themselves to their allotted works, and make garments for themselves and others." And again: "The day is not a day of fasting, but the day is a day of joy; the Church has always considered it a day of joy, and none but heretics have thought otherwise."

I skip from that time till we come to Luther. What does Luther say about it? Luther says: "If anywhere the day [Sunday] is made holy for the mere day's sake,—if anywhere, any one sets up its observance on a Jewish foundation, then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to feast on it, to do anything to remove this encroachment on Christian liberty." And Calvin (he certainly was no looser on the Sunday question or any other than his flock) even went so far as to propose to change the day from Sunday to Thursday as a distinct assertion of the Christian principle that one day was just as good as another; and one day, when John Knox visited Calvin on Sunday afternoon, he found him playing at a game of bowls. Now John Calvin is almost worshipped in our modern Orthodox churches; and yet, if he were consistently living to-day after the pattern that he followed when he did live, there is not a church in Boston that would not discipline him.

Beza, another great reformer, advocated work on Sunday. Bucer insisted that abstinence from labor could not possibly be pleasing to God.

We come now, then, to the Puritan reaction, and to notice its causes. I must be very brief in all this, lest I overstep the limits of my time. The first cause seems to me, apart from that which Mr. Whipple has stated, was this: Here the Catholic Church had had almost an innumerable number of festival days or church days—holy days—one of them so far as the ordinary Catholic was concerned being just as holy as the other. These had based themselves on their traditions. The authority of the Church was sufficient for keeping Sunday or any other day; but the Protestants protested against the authority and the power of the Church, and distinctly placed themselves on the foundation of the word of God. What they could not find there, they didn't claim to find anywhere. They wished, and it was a necessary part of their system, that they should continue the observance of the Lord's day. It was a day when they met together to preach,—a day, it is fair to say, without which the existence of the Church itself would almost be an impossibility. Since they had thrown away the Pope and the authority of the Church, they must find greater authority for the day, or else they must give it up; and so of course they took the best sacred authority they could find, whether it was very good or not. They didn't attempt to find much in the New Testament. They went back distinctly and directly to the fourth commandment, and said: "Here is Divine authority for keeping the Sabbath day; and no matter if it is now the first day of the week, instead of the last, we don't know but that the apostles of Jesus, in some unrecorded saying, or institution, or conversation, made the change." So that the Church simply switched off one track to the other, and has since that time come down the centuries on the first-day track instead of on the seventh. They read this fourth commandment in their service every Sunday, and based here the keeping of the Lord's day.

But another important influence was the Puritan revolt from the rude sports of the time. The young men were accustomed to practise all sorts of rude, half-barbarous sports on Sunday. Of course they interfered not only with the purity necessary to the highest civilization, and it was well they were abolished, but they shocked the religious spirit of the time. As an illustration of what they were, Thackeray says: "An Englishman is not necessarily a brute; but an English brute is the worst sort of brute." You can judge from a passage like that as to what the nature of these sports might have been, and how they shocked the really high sentiment of Puritan theology and purity of principle; while on the other hand the Puritans carried their opposition to worldliness, to worldly pleasure, to worldly joys so far, that to their minds it was wicked to be frivolous on Sunday and perhaps on all the other six days beside,—but at any rate on Sunday, whether they could stop it at any other time or not. So Macaulay, hitting at the extreme repugnance of the Puritans against popular sports, says a thing on the other side that perhaps is something of an exaggeration, and no more just than Thackeray's statement on the first. He says: "The Puritans oppose bear-bating on Sunday, not because it gave pain to the bears, but because it gave pleasure to the people."

But the Puritan Sunday (and here I come to another important division of my talk) has been called "Sabbatizing," or a going back to the Jewish Sabbath. This is popularly supposed to be true, and the day has come to be called the Sabbath; but let us see whether it is true or not. I have said, and I have admitted, and I wish to refer to it, so that you can't accuse me of being guilty of contradiction, for I am not,—they did go back to the fourth commandment as the fundamental law on which they built their divine demand that the Sabbath, or the Lord's day, should be kept; and it is popularly supposed, and no doubt they supposed, that the kind of Sabbath which they instituted, the Puritan Sabbath as it has come to be called, was really the resurrection of the old Jewish Sabbath,—that they had gone back and picked up again the genuine thing. Now let us see if that were true. What was the Jewish Sabbath? What kind of a day was it? Was it anything like the Puritan Sabbath? I quote the late Emanuel Deutsch, a librarian of the British Museum, and one of the most learned Orientalists of his day, author of remarkable articles on Islam, the Talmud, etc. He was one of the best authors on this subject probably the world contained at that time. He says: "We cannot refrain from entering an emphatic protest against the vulgar notion of the Jewish Sabbath being a thing of grim austerity. It was precisely the contrary, a day of joy and delight, a feast day, honored by fine garments, by the best cheer, by wine, lights, spice, and other joys of preeminently bodily import." That is his authority as to what the Jewish Sabbath really was. You will notice, he does not say they labored on that day; that one thing is left out.

Take a more ancient authority still. Nehemiah, in the eighth chapter, tenth verse (and remember that he was building the city again, that he was restoring the ancient religion of the Jews to what he supposed to be its pure and original condition), says to the people who were sobbing and weeping when they found what laws of God they had broken, and how they had fallen under his wrath: "Go your way. Eat the fat, drink the sweet, and send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared; for this day is holy unto our Lord. Neither be ye sorry, for the joy of the Lord is your strength." And the 12th verse adds: "And all the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth." That was not the Puritan way, certainly, of keeping Sunday. [Laughter.]

Now only ignorance can possibly talk of the Puritans as Judaizing, or of going back to the original Bible idea when they were making their Sunday. There is no day in modern times that people are familiar with, that can so fitly and properly be spoken of, in comparison with the old Jewish Sabbath, as our Thanksgiving day. Simply leave out the element of labor, and then, in this gathering of children and friends about their festal boards, the joy and lights, and the good time, the happiness and mirth of all this, you might look upon as almost a perfect literal resurrection of the old Jewish Sabbath. The Puritan Sabbath, then, was not the resurrection of anything. It was an outright creation of something that never existed in the world before.

Now as to whether this is the fourth commandment, and as to the Church's attitude to-day in going back to the fourth commandment as authority for Sunday-keeping, I wish to say one word, and this is my last. I wonder if it ever occurs to ministers, before preaching on the Sunday question, and to their people while they are listening to them, or afterwards,—I wonder if it ever occurs to them to read the fourth commandment, with the distinct purpose of seeing just what it says. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy"; and "holy" there, as everybody knows, means simply, according to its ancient significance, something sacred, set apart, to a particular and special use, which particular and special use was, the command goes on to define, simply this: Thou shalt do no labor. The whole of the fourth commandment, without any evidence of any reservation whatever,—the totality of the fourth commandment is simply abstinence from labor. Now I dare assert, without fear of contradiction, that except in some few special cases there is not an Orthodox minister or church-member in Boston, unless he is sick so that he cannot move easily, who ever thinks of obeying the fourth commandment, or ever does it. [Laughter and applause.] What is it they do? Why, they have invented a whole round of duties—church-going, Sunday-school, everything,—against which, mark me, I have no word to say; but I say they have invented a whole round of duties, a whole curriculum of obligations lasting from sunrise to sunset, in many cases, that neither the fourth commandment nor the Bible anywhere has ever said one single word concerning. And then, on the basis of the fourth commandment, they demand that you shall religiously be bound to keep all their observances. That is (and this is the logic of the whole thing), because the fourth commandment commands people to do a certain thing, therefore you shall be under obligation forever—excuse me, let me go back and put another element in: because the fourth commandment commands certain people on a certain day to abstain from labor and to do a certain thing, therefore all people, in all ages, on some other day, shall be under divine obligation to do something else. [Applause and laughter.] That is the whole of it.

Now for this Christian nation to assume the position which it did concerning the Centennial Exhibition being open on Sunday, and to claim that they did it because of the divine authority of Christianity or of the Old Testament, one or the other, I say, they are guilty before the enlightened intelligence of this country and of the world of one of two things: either of such gross ignorance as unfits them to be teachers of the intelligence of the nineteenth century, or else they are guilty of the grossest hypocrisy—hypocrisy that claims goodness and character on the score of doing something that God has never asked anybody to do. [Applause.] The very minister who preaches the gospel to-day in Boston, by as much as he is faithful to the needs and wants of his parish, is breaking the Sabbath, according to the fourth commandment, every single Sunday,—that is, admitting the transfer from Saturday to the first day of the week. It simply says: "Thou shalt not labor,"—and there is not a man who felicitates himself on the faithfulness with which he discharges his Christian obligations who is not going right square in the face of the fourth commandment every hour of the Lord's day, from sunrise to sunset; and yet they come to us, and charge us with infidelity, with lack of reverence for God and his word and truth, because we can't possibly see how an obligation of the Jews to do one thing is obligation on us to do another thing. [Applause.]

On the conclusion of Mr. Savage's essay, Mr. Higginson said:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: We had hope held out to us that the Rev. E. E. Hale would be present this morning. If he is here in the hall—though he is not easily concealed, he may elude my vision,—if he is here in the hall, I wish he would show himself, and make himself both seen and heard. If he is not here, I assume, that, being a gentleman who always has, in the discharge of his multifarious duties, to be in half a dozen places at once, he is in several of the other places. Or it is possible that he may have looked in here, and would say, as Dennis, the hero of that charming sketch of his, "My Double and how he Undid me," used to on public occasions: "There has been so much said, and on the whole so well said, that I may be excused from saying anything." But yet, at the same time, we don't like to excuse him, and hope we shall hear from him at some other time. In his place, is there not some one of the audience who wishes to say something? Because I am firm in the conviction that this is to be a free discussion.

MOSES HULL.—There is no institution I think more of, probably, than the Liberal League.

MR. HIGGINSON.—This is not a meeting of the Liberal League, but of the Free Religious Association.

MR. HULL.—If there is any one thing I feel sorry for, it is to have a good cause spoiled by a poor argument. I am certain, if the Rev. E. E. Hale or somebody else was here who was going to take the opposite side of this question, that many of the arguments we have listened to this morning would be picked to pieces very quickly. It would take only thirty minutes at the outside to show that there was a great deal mixed that ought not to be mixed, and put together that belongs apart. One or two instances: It was said in one of the lectures that the phrase, "first day of the week," occurs but twice in the New Testament. It occurs eight times in the New Testament. One thing more: I will prove by the New Testament itself, that Paul labored on seventy-eight successive "first days of the week," and that he kept seventy-eight Sabbaths during the time he labored on these first days of the week. Paul said: "Ye observe days and times and months and years; I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain." That was supposed to militate against Paul's fashion of keeping the seventh day of the week. Take the whole book of Galatians, written by Paul,—it opposes the law; take the book of Romans, and it everywhere advocates the law. How are these things to be brought together? Simply thus: there were two laws, one of them the ten commandments, generally called the moral law,—another a law that was added "because of transgressions." In the book of Galatians Paul is commenting on that added law. A violation of the ten commandments brought death, and the added law looked to a victim to step in between the transgressor and the law. This added law is the one he is stating to you in Galatians was everywhere abolished. In Romans, as does the New Testament everywhere, he urges obedience to the ten commandments, and everywhere opposes the added law. "Let no man judge you, therefore, in meat or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days, which are a shadow of things to come." Now if our brother had read the remainder of that, it would have been perfectly clear; but he stopped at "Sabbath days." Paul does not stop there, "which are a shadow of things to come." Now turn to the Jewish Bible, and I will show you a great many annual Sabbaths, the sixteenth day of the first month, the tenth day of the seventh month, and others that were Sabbaths which were "shadows of things to come"; but the fourth commandment had no shadow in it. The seventh day Sabbath pointed back to creation, and not forward to anything in the future; every other Sabbath pointed forward. Paul makes a distinction now. He tells you not to observe these Sabbaths "which were the shadow of things to come." These, he tells you, have gone, but the other he does not claim is done away.

I think there are one or two more points. As to the catalogues of sins, they are quoted from the added law and not from the ten commandments. Our brother said: "There is no record in the New Testament of keeping the Sabbath." Just let me give one instance: "And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments, and rested on the Sabbath day, according to the commandment." That does look as though there was a record of keeping the Sabbath and keeping it according to the commandment; and as there was no commandment in the New Testament for them to keep the Sabbath according to the law, they must keep it according to the "commandment" in the Old Testament.

Now I come to the change of Sabbath. It is Neander, I think, who says: "They know little about religion who do not know that the first day of the week did remain, and was observed as the Sabbath for three hundred years this side of our Savior's passion. The day was adopted first by the Christian Church,—then was taken by Catholic authority and by the Catholic Church. I will ask for no other authority than Catholics themselves. They always tell you, in all their books and their catechisms, that it is by their authority, and no other, that the day was changed; and they say that the Protestant churches acknowledge their authority by keeping the first day of the week, always by the tradition of the Catholic Church alone. If we went no further than the fourth commandment, in supposing that every minister violates the fourth commandment in laboring on Sunday (that is, in teaching and in talking to them, in doing his duties as a minister),—there might be a sense in which that is true; but there was divine sanction and protection in the Old Testament for the "holy convocation" of the Sabbath day. If they violated their own law then, there would be no more harm in violating that law now; if they would move a "holy convocation," and the priest could read the law to the people and teach the people, without violating the commandment then, it might not be a violation of the Sabbath now. But if we stand upon the Bible on this Sabbath question, let us do just what the Bible shows: that the Sabbath never has been changed from the first day of the week to the seventh, that it never has been abolished, that the seventh day of the week, according to the Old and New Testament, is still the Sabbath; and if we must urge any Sabbath upon the people, let us urge that. [Applause.]

Mr. POTTER.—I think the gentleman must have misunderstood one point. In the opening of his remarks, he said that in the essay (I suppose referring to the one that was read by myself, written by Mr. Whipple), it was stated that the phrase, "the first day of the week," only occurs twice in the New Testament. That remark was not made by Mr. Whipple. He says: "The first day of the week is a phrase several times met with in the New Testament." Then afterwards he goes on to say: "The cases in the New Testament where the first day of the week is mentioned in connection with the assembling of the people, the gathering together of numbers, etc., are two, and no more." That, I believe, will be found to be correct. Mr. Whipple also expressly says that the Sabbath day is frequently mentioned in the New Testament, but always referring to the old Jewish Sabbath.

At this point the convention adjourned to three o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The convention was again called to order at three o'clock by Mr. Higginson, who spoke as follows:—

I was a little amused at a colloquy I took part in at the door just now. Some one drifted in with that inquiring expression which some people have in a strange city, when they are trying to get to their own quarters and don't know where they are; and the drifting individual said: "Is this the Church Congress?" I said: "If you mean the Episcopal Church Congress, I think not." "Well," said he, "it is a kind of branch of that, isn't it?" "No, sir," said I; "that is a kind of branch of this." [Laughter.] And that suggests a word on that subject. The Episcopal Church Congress is an organization of which, I think, no liberal-minded man can speak otherwise than with respect, for this reason: here is a Church a large part of whose strength lies in tradition, organization, form, ritual, hierarchy. And I say it is an admirable and a manly thing, when such an organization, waiving all that, comes together in a simple Congress, upon the simple Congregational ground and simpler American ground,—when clergymen and bishops and "lord-bishops" even, as they call them in England and Canada, and even in the Daily Advertiser, and are willing to lay aside all the advantage of their spiritual superiority, and simply meet as man to man. (I wish I could add also as woman to woman; but I think, unlike us, they are confined by that limit of sex, as yet, in that organization.) I repeat that I feel a hearty respect for that Episcopal Church Congress, in the law and in the basis of its organization. But yet, when I look over the list of questions to be discussed there, I say to myself: Why was it left for us here to ask the question, momentous in all Christian organizations: "What is the best use of Sunday?" In the Episcopal churches, I understand, there is no essential difference as to the question of the value of art, applied to religion. Every churchman believes in that as a matter of course. They meet and they discuss that,—a question on which all are agreed. But here is a question which, in Philadelphia the other day, ran its ploughshare through the middle of ecclesiastical organizations,—the Episcopal Church included. I have been told by Philadelphia friends that, in taking sides on the question whether the great Exhibition should be open on Sunday, it was amazing to see how people went by their sect or their denomination, except in two cases. The Jews were for opening the Exhibition on Sunday, of course. The Catholics were for opening it, and the Unitarians were for opening it, as far as they went. On the other hand, all the Evangelical denominations, including, I suppose, the Universalists, though I don't know, thought the other way. But in the Episcopal Church and in the Quaker societies, the ploughshare went through the middle. All the Orthodox Quakers were opposed to opening it, and all the Hicksite Quakers in favor of it. As a rule, I was told the High Church Episcopalians said, "Let it be opened;" the Low Church Episcopalians said, "Let it be closed." Now I say, if that is the case, and here is a question which has divided that strong and intellectual and energetic body of Christian men, why is it that they meet and discuss a dozen other questions, and leave us to discuss this? For this reason, if for no other, we supplement their work; but in another point of view they eminently supplement ours. For it was here, and not there,—it was this platform and not that, that welcomed among its speakers this morning a man who stood outside of the Christian Church altogether, and recognized a Jewish rabbi as equally an American citizen with a Christian bishop. [Applause.] We will meet again upon this larger basis, as I call your attention to the proceedings of the convention. We shall begin by an address, as announced, by Mr. Pratt, of this city, on the subject of "The Lord's day Legislation of Massachusetts."

Mr. Pratt said:—

ADDRESS OF CHARLES E. PRATT, ESQ.

When I received one of Mr. Potter's very winning letters inviting me, a few days ago, to furnish an essay for this afternoon, I expressed grave doubt whether the exactions of my profession would admit of my taking time for it. The result has proved that my fears were correct; and therefore instead of giving an essay, as I find it announced, I shall only be able to give you some crude, desultory, extemporaneous remarks helped out by some memoranda of statutes and laws passed heretofore in this Commonwealth, and in the province and colony of the Massachusetts Bay.

I regret all the more that I was unable to prepare a written essay, because upon this question it is necessary to observe great carefulness of expression. If one expresses liberal sentiments in regard to Sunday observance, or if he suggests that the law as it stands might be advantageously changed, on the one hand he is said to be attacking the institution of Sunday. On the other hand, if he is conservative and a little careful that innovations shall not come too fast, is willing to observe the good and the blessings in the institution, as it is, then he is likely to be called a bigot, or an unenlightened conservative, behind the time. I believe in a secular Sunday. In this secular government of ours, and under its sway, laws should be secular, institutions should be secular, and so far as the statutes have anything to do with the observance of Sunday, or any other holiday—for you recollect Sunday is but one of the holidays

—these laws should be strictly secular in their purport. And having said this, I would also add that I believe in the observance of a secular Sunday, in the careful, social, moral, and religious observance of Sunday, and I believe that some laws are necessary for the preservation of an institution fraught with so much good and so much of blessing to the community and of happiness both by the fireside and in the social public.

The Jewish Sabbath of the fourth commandment I understand to have been a special institution for the Hebrew race. The ceremonial observance of the Jewish Sabbath was discountenanced by Jesus and his disciples, and no other day was by them substituted in its place. The Jewish Sabbath occurred on the seventh day of the week, and the Lord's day, as we call it, or Sunday, occurs on the first day of the week; and therefore, both historically and Biblically speaking, I think it is to be agreed that we have no Scriptural foundation for the observance of the Lord's day, as it has been historically observed in this Commonwealth. It was not, as I understand the history of it, till about the year 321, under the rule of Constantine, that any civil law was passed recognizing the observance of Sunday. And it was not till the reign of Queen Elizabeth in England, that any English statute was ever passed that I have been able to find respecting Sunday observance. Nor was the religious observance of the day a part of the common law. Sunday, therefore, is a human institution, and not a Divine. It is a subject, not of moral law, but of statute law. Non-observance of it is violation, not profanation; malum prohibitum, not malum in se. I cannot go into these questions, however, which I have merely hinted at in these preliminary remarks. I must be limited to the historical aspects of Sunday and its observance in this Commonwealth; but I thought it necessary to sketch first this understanding which I have of the institution, this previous legal history of the day, before the English statutes, under which our forefathers were when they came to this country, that you might see what foundation there was behind our forefathers, upon which they could plant their Sunday laws. It will be evident that they did not hold this view of the Lord's day.

Two hundred and fifty years ago, they used indiscriminately in the statutes, for a short period, the term "Sabbath" and the term "Lord's day." I don't find that "Sunday" was ever used in the statutes, and as the name of the day is significant, in passing I will call attention to it. The more careful of the colonists called it the "first day of the week," as the Quakers do; the more Biblical of them called it the "Sabbath," but always in the laws you will find it called the "Lord's day." I have no doubt that a legislature of Free Religionists, under a secular government, would give the day its secular name.

Our forefathers brought the Lord's day with them, when they came to this country; and as a creation of statute law it was then very recent. At the common law no such thing as the "Lord's day" is known. It has sometimes been stated erroneously in this country, that Sunday is a part of the common law. As a matter of fact, the only recognition of Sunday at the common law, was that it was, in law phrase, not a judicial day. The Lord's day is not a judicial day. "Dies dominicus non est juridicus." Parliament sat on Sunday, festivals were held on Sunday, everything could be done on Sunday, but courts of law could not sit, and judicial processes could neither be issued nor served. The first English statute, which I find, imposing any restraint or duty upon the observance of the day, was passed in 1558, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and that statute required all persons who had not reasonable excuse to resort every Sunday and other holiday to church for divine service and worship. [2 Eliz. c. 2.]

But there came a time in the first quarter of the seventeenth century, when the affluence of religious expression and the poverty of religious action were truly surprising. And from the year 1625 the day was referred to in English statutes as the Lord's day. In that year a somewhat more stringent Sunday law was passed. [1 Car. I. c. 1. 3 Car. I. c. 1.] And subsequently under Charles II. and William III., statutes were passed, which I believe are still in force in England, and which were quite as rigid as any of our early statutes, though not carried to so extreme detail. [20 Car. 2. c. 7. 7 Will. 3. c. 17.] Under the latter, about 1693, all persons were required to apply themselves to the observance of the Lord's day, by exercising themselves thereon in the duties of true religion, publicly and privately. No work save of necessity or charity; no sport, game, or pastime; no travel, etc., was to be allowed. And all these English statutes were put upon a religious basis. They were passed for the honor of God and for the preservation of true religion.

From some attentive perusal of the early statutes, enactments, and orders in this land, I have come to the conclusion that the same affluence of religious expression and poverty of religious doing, prevailed with our forefathers when they came here and brought the Sunday laws with them. The colony charter was granted in 1628, as you will remember. The first colonists were then under the English statutes, which I have read extracts from; but these seem not to have been sufficiently strict; for as early as the 17th of April, 1629, we find the first Sunday law of the Colony to read thus [in the Records of the Governor and Company of the Massachusetts Bay in New England]: "And to the end the Sabbath may be celebrated in a religious manner, we appoint, that all that inhabit the plantacon, both for the gen'l and ppculer employmts, may surcease their labor every Saturday throughout the years at three of the clock in the afternoon, and that they spend the rest of that day in catechising and pparacon for the Saboth, as the ministers shall direct." [20 App.

395.] That is the first Sunday law. In 1684 they passed a second one which reads as follows: "Whereas complaints hath bene made to this Court that dyvers psons within this jurisdiction doe usually absent themselves from church meetings vpon the Lord's day, power is therefore given to any two Assistants to heare and sensure, either by fyne or imprisonment (att their discrecon), all misdemeanors of that kind comitted by any inhabitant within this jurisdiction, provided they exceed not the fyne of vs for one offence." [20. March 4, 1684. 20, p. 140.]

In 1644, the law-makers put certain questions to the elders, for the purpose of being guided thereby in passing laws, very much as our general court sometimes propounds questions to the supreme judicial court, for its opinion to guide in passing laws,—and among these questions was this: "Whether a judge be bound to pronounce such sentence as a positive law prescribes, in case it be apparently above or beneath the merit of the offence?" And the elder answered, among other things, and this is particularly notable: "2. In case variable circumstances of an offence do so much vary the degrees of guilt, that the offence is raised to an higher nature, then the penalty must be varied to an higher answerable proportion. The striking of a neighbor may be punished with some pecuniary mulct, when the striking of a father may be punished with death. So any sin committed with an high hand, as the gathering of sticks on the Sabbath day, may be punished with death, when a lesser punishment might serve for gathering sticks privily, and in some sore need." It is to the credit of the law-makers, however, that they did not pass any law in conformity with the judgment of the elders.

On the fourth of November, 1646, I find that this law was put on the statute book: "It is therefore ordered and decreed by ye Corte, yt if any Christian within this jurisdiction shall go about to subvert and destroy the Christian faith and religion [by other things, and] by devising ye morality of ye 4th commandment [i.e.], evry such pson continuing obstinate therein, after due meanes of conviction, shall pay to ye comon treasury during ye first six months 20s. a month, & for ye next six months 40s. p mo, and so to continue dureing his obstinacy; & if any such pson shall endeavr to reduce others to ye like heresy & apostasy from ye faith & religion of er Lord Jesus Christ, he shall forfeit to ye comon treasury, for evry severall offence therein, five pounds." [Id. p. 177.] And in that year there was a fyne of 5 shs decreed for each absence from "hearing ye publike ministry of ye word, on the Lord's days & fast & thanksgiving days." [Id. id.]

A little later than that—I don't know but I ought to bespeak your patience while I read so many of these extracts; but I thought in no other way could I get the exact historical state of the law in Massachusetts before you so directly, as to read you the statutes themselves; and with your permission I will go on and read a few more: "Att a Generall Court of Election, held att Boston, the 30th of the 6th month 1658, [80 Aug.] Vpon information of sundry abuses & misdemeanors committed by severall psons on the Lords day, not only by children playinge in the streetes & other places, but by youtnes, maydes, & other psons, both strangers & others, vncivilly walkinge the streetes and fields, travilling from towne to towne, goeing on shipboard, frequentinge common houses and other places to drinke, sport, & otherwise to mispend that p'cious time, whiche things tend much to the dishonr of God, the reproach of religion, & the pphanation of his holy Saboath, the sanctification whereof is sometime put for all duties immediatly respectinge the service of God contained in the first table, it is therefore ordered by this Court and the authorities, that no children, youtnes, maydes, or other psons, shall transgress in the like kind, on penalty of beinge reputed great provokers of the high displeasure off Almighty God, and further incurringe the penalties hereafter expressed; namely, that the parents and governors of all children above seven years old (not that we approve of younger children in evill), for the first offence in that kind, vpon due profe before any magistrate, towne commissioner, or select man of the towne where such offence shalbe committed, shalbe admonished; for a second offence, vpon due profe as aforesd, shal pay as a fyne five shillings; & for a third offence, vpon due profe as aforesd, 10s; and if they shall agayne offend in this kind, they shalbe p'sented to the County Court, who shall augment punishment according to the merit of the fact; & for all youtnes and maydes above fourteen yeares of age, & all elder psons whatsoever that shall offend and be convict as aforesd, either for playing, uncivilly walking, drinkeinge, travilling from towne to towne, goeing on shipboard, sportinge, or any way mispendinge that p'cious time, shall for the first offence be admonished, vpon due profe as aforesd; for a second offence shal pay as a fyne five shillings; & for a third offence, ten shillings; & if any shall farther offend that way, they shalbe p'sented to the next county court, who shall augment punishment according to the nature of the offence; & if any be vnable or vnwillinge to pay the aforesd fyne, they shalbe whipped by the constable not exceeding five stripes for 10s fyne; & this to be understood of such offences as shalbe committed dureing the daylight of the Lord's day." [2 Id. 316.]

In 1658, finding this statute not sufficient to answer the purpose, we have the following: "Whereas by too sad experience it is observed, the sunn being sett, both evry Saturday & on the Lords day, young people & others take liberty to walke and sporte themselves in the streets or fields in the severall townes of this jurisdiction, to the dishonor of God," etc., decreed a fyne or corporal punishment for the like on Saturday evening or Sunday evening after sunset.

Still later, 14 Oct. 1668. "For the better prevention of the breach of the Saboath, it is enacted by this court & ye authority thereof, that no servile worke shall be don on that day; namely, such as are not workes of piety, of charity, or of necessity; & when other workes are done on that day, the person so doing, upon complaint or presentment, being legally convicted thereof before any magistrate or county court, shall pay for the first offence ten shillings fyne, & for evry offence after to be doubled; & in case the offence herein be circumstanced with prophanes or high handed presumption, the penalty is to be augmented att the discretion of the judges. As an addition to the law for preventing prophaning of the Saboath day by doing servile worke, this Court doth order, that whatsoever person in this jurisdiction shall travell vpon the Lords day, either on horseback or on foote, or by boats from or out of their owne towne to any vnlawful assembly or meeting not allowed by lawe, are hereby declared to be prophanes of the Sabath, & shall be proceeded against as the persons that prophane the Lords day by doing servile worke." [4 Id Pt. II. p. 395.]

In 1677 a cage was ordered to be erected in Boston in which to confine "Saboath breakers."

In May, 1677, tythingmen were appointed to inspect houses, and discover Sabbath-breakers.

In 1679, a ward was ordered to be set, from sunset to nine o'clock on Saturday night, both at the town's end and at the fortifications to prevent passing out of town, with authority to stop every person passing. [5 Id. 239.]

Such were most of the colony laws respecting the Lord's day. They show that its observance was based upon purely religious and superstitious grounds. They were for a people who feared to profane the day lest the dreadful judgments of God should fall on the colony for their disobedience. In some official editions, the laws were annotated with references to Old Testament texts. To show further the bigotry and intolerance of the people, from their own solemn enactments, let me cite a passage or two. In 1653 it is enacted broadly: "And evry person that shall publish and maintain any heterodox or erroneous doctrine, shall be liable to be questioned and censured by the County Court where he liveth, according to the merit of his offence." [Charters & General Laws, &c., p. 123.] And in 1664, it is enacted that they who are to be admitted as freemen (i. e., entitled to vote, hold office, &c.) must present a "certificate from the ministers or minister of the place where they dwell, that they are Orthodox in religion," etc. [Id. 117.] And we have already had a more striking specimen of their promptness in the pursuit of heresy and apostasy. The measure of the prevalent ideas of liberty of conscience in 1691 when the Province Charter was granted, and the colony became a province, is indicated pretty clearly by a clause in that charter itself, which establishes and ordains "that forever hereafter there shall be liberty of conscience allowed in the worship of God to all Christians except papists" in said province or territory. [Id. 31.]

In 1692, the old colonial laws were substantially reenacted; and in that statute occur these words: "That all and evry person and persons whatsoever, shall, on that [the Lord's] day, carefully apply themselves to duties of religion and piety, publicly and privately." In 1727, "the solemnizing of funerals on the Lord's day" or evening following, is prohibited.

From this examination of the statutes, I think we can get a pretty fair view of what the Massachusetts Sabbath was, up to the time Massachusetts became a Commonwealth. Others have supplied, or will supply the details which show how it was practically observed; but so far as we can discern from these statute books, that is what it was. I think it is related of a chaplain of the Count de Rochambeau, who was here in Boston about 1780, writing letters home to France, that the strictness of the day's observance astonished him. It looked very strange to him to see everything so still, the streets deserted, no entertainment, nothing for diversion, except to go to church. The most innocent recreations and pleasures prohibited. If he met a person on the street he scarcely dared to stop and speak with him. Attempting to take a little walk for health and fresh air, he and his friend were met at the door by their landlord who warned them that he would be liable to a heavy fine if he allowed them, while stopping with him, to disport themselves on that day in public. Somewhat disappointed they returned to their rooms, and his friend, thinking to beguile part of the time in that way, took up his flute and commenced to play some pious air. He had played but a few bars before the enraged populace collected round the house and would have given him other bars to play had not his excited landlord put his head in at the unlatched door to say, "My gear sir, nothing of that kind is allowed in this city on the Lord's day. You will be liable to punishment, and I shall be liable to a fine for allowing it in my house." A great many instances of that sort could be produced to show the extreme rigidity of the Sunday laws and Sunday observance at that time. I suppose, too, that at that time they were in great part sustained by the prevailing public opinion, because you generally find that the laws of a community are not very far behind the prevailing popular ideas. They are a little behind; once fixed it takes some time to change them, and public opinion is always a little in advance of the statute book; but when you find, as we have found here, that for a period of time from 1628 to 1780 such statutes as these existed upon the statute books, in Massachusetts and you have only to look into the records further to find that there were convictions under these laws, that they were actually put in force,—it is pretty safe to infer that the public opinion of Massachusetts up to that time sustained such laws.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY ON NIAGARA.

In a recent lecture at Nashville, Tenn., Professor Huxley said, "I know it is thought very often that men of science are in the habit of drawing largely from their imagination, but it is really not so. The most sober, careful consideration of facts forces upon you more and more determinedly the conviction that the theory respecting which we have this archeological evidence of a period of the past history of the world is of a duration which, in comparison with our human standard, may be regarded as almost absolutely infinite. Take, for example, the case of the cataract of Niagara, where I have been recently spending some time, so that I might fill myself with the grandeur and beauty of that extraordinary natural phenomenon; it is quite easy to see that the Niagara River has formed its own valley, has cut its way back through the plateau of rock from which it falls for some six miles. There is not the slightest difficulty in seeing that. The great cliff from which it tumbles is formed of two kinds of rock, hard rock at the top and soft rock underneath. The water undermines the soft rock below, when the solid stratum above falls over. You can trace the gradual excavation of that valley for six miles from that marvellous bluff which from Proctor's monument overlooks the plain of Ontario. Now the rate at which that work is going on has not yet been positively ascertained; but we may be perfectly certain (I am now speaking largely within limits) that the work of cutting back does not go on at the rate of a yard in a year. We have six miles of such cutting, which will bring you to a period of ten thousand years for the cutting back of Niagara alone. It is an immaterial matter to me how many years it takes, but it would be nearer probability, much nearer the truth, if I had said three or four times that amount."

"What relations does a period of that kind bear to the vast duration expressed by these vast ledges of strata which form the globe? We are a people curious enough to form a very distinct calculation of this. The sides of the ravine through which Niagara is cutting its way are formed by masses of alluvial matter, which must be older than the river which has cut through it. While in that alluvial matter you find the remains of shell-fish, undistinguishable from those which now inhabit the lake, and along with them you find—as has been found—the teeth of the mastodon, which we know from abundant evidence was an inhabitant of the continent of North America at a comparatively recent period, the very last step of that long series of changes, of which the limestone, upon which you are now standing, indicates one of the older ones."

"Thus it follows that the whole work of Niagara occupies one period of this vast duration. In relation to our duration of time, that ten thousand years, or whatever else it may have been, is but an infinitesimal fragment of time, so far as the great phenomena of the globe are concerned. During that vast time the population of the globe has undergone a slow, constant, and gradual change, one species giving way to another. We have passed by slow and gradual methods, without vast and sudden changes, into that state of things which obtain at present. I need not say that this view of the past history of the globe is a very different one from that which is commonly taken. It is so widely different that it is absolutely impossible to affect any kind of community, any kind of parallel, far less any sort of reconciliation between these two. One of these must be true. The other is not."

THE POPE AND SULTAN.

Anachronisms wand! Ambiguous sway
Of sacerdotal kings the world no more
Endures! Looms near the final, destined clay,
When Superstition's rule on earth is o'er,
And you, like phantoms pale, shall fade away
Into the mists which did engulf of yore
The Persian Magi and Nile's hierarchs hoar.
Your causes both are lost, and whose draws
A sword to champion you will surely fall,
And dim with foulest stains his warlike mail,
Striving Truth's chariot-wheels to block and stay;
Striving to keep the breaking fetter whole,
Which bindeth, not the limbs alone, but soul,
When light in torrents streams from pole to pole.

NOTICE.

On receipt of $3.20, THE INDEX will be sent to any name not already on its mail-list, from the present time until January 1, 1878. This is an excellent opportunity for friends of the paper to increase its circulation among their acquaintances; and it is hoped that they will not neglect to render in this way some greatly-needed assistance to the important cause it represents.

TICKETS for the "Course of Ten Lectures by Distinguished Women," at the Paine Building, on Sunday evenings, can be had at this office, as announced on our last page. The first lecture of the course was by Miss Anthony.

COMMENTING on a contributor's disapproval of the order of the Boston School Committee discontinuing the practice of prayer at the opening of the school sessions, the New Century for Woman made not long since these very liberal editorial remarks: "Although it does seem that differing sects and creeds might all unite in the simple aspiration of the Lord's Prayer, we cannot regret, with our correspondent, the arrangements that place the public schools on a secular basis. Home is the place for religious instruction, and the child who is well taught there will suffer no loss in either its devotional or moral sense, when the school exercises begin with the simple calling of the roll. For those who have no such teaching, other agencies are always at work; and while it is easy to see that those who work the hardest will gain the most, it is well to have the conflict of such earnest and differing agencies removed from the broad platform of our public schools." If all women would second these wise words of their truly statesmanlike representative, one of the most insidious political dangers of the future would be averted forever.

FROM AN American gentleman in Paris come these pleasant and encouraging words: "I wish to renew my subscription to THE INDEX for another year. I open no paper with so much pleasure, and certainly read none with so much interest and profit. I cannot do without it. . . . Is it not delightfully encouraging and animating to find Huxley and our own Emerson so perfectly in accord? I see, in your issue of September 21, you quote the eloquent and very thoughtful conclusion of Prof. Huxley's address at the opening of the Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. Compare what the distinguished English scientist then said with Mr. Emerson's Phi Beta Kappa address at Cambridge, July 18, 1867: 'The foundation of culture, as of character, is at last the moral sentiment. This is the fountain of power, preserves its eternal newness, draws its own rent out of every novelty in science. Science corrects the old creeds, sweeps away with every new perception our infantile catechisms, and necessitates a faith commensurate with the grander orbits and universal laws which it discloses. Yet it does not surprise the moral sentiment. That was older, and awaited expectant these larger insights.' Pardon this long quotation, but one cannot well read that address too often. Most people are simply ferrymen, crossing from shore to shore, with land always in sight; but you launch out into the deep, and 'sail with God the seas,' and there I am heartily with you."

REV. A. B. KENDIG is a Methodist clergyman of this vicinity whose light cannot be hid under a bushel. He presides over Monument Square Church, and is, in fact, himself a monument of marvellous altitude. A recent "sermon to young men," he declared that he would "undertake to point out unmistakable proofs of God's existence." He then proceeded to instance "the pillar of fire which guided the children of Israel in their forty years' journey"—the "case when Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, and it obeyed him"—the "case of Elisha, when he prayed to God to turn the sun backward in its course, and it was done." To reinforce this array of "unmistakable proofs," and strike dumb the audacious sceptic, Mr. Kendig brought down Thor's hammer on his luckless head as follows: "Take the case of Jonah, and explain how it happened that such a combination of circumstances was brought about that a storm came up—he was thrown from the ship and swallowed by the whale. Perhaps some of the young men present have got so far advanced in science that they do not believe the story of Jonah and the whale: but I tell them, whether they do or not, the Son of God did!" Lastly, as if to scalp the demolished doubter with the knife of resistless logic, "the circumstances connected with the burning of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were considered by the speaker, and the conclusion drawn that there was, and is, a good God who superintended the affairs of men"—his goodness being particularly evinced, we presume, by the rain of fire and brimstone. In short, Mr. Kendig may be conceived as advising the dismayed atheist to emigrate forthwith from Boston, with the sacred and solemn adjuration of Horace Greeley: "Go West, young man, go West!"

MR. R. W. JESS, of Riverton, Illinois, inquires the reasons for our conclusion that the Republican party are practically committed to amend the Constitution in the interest of Protestant Orthodoxy. These reasons have been stated at great length in THE INDEX during the past few months, particularly in the issues of August 24 and 31, and September 7 and 14. An incomplete recognition of the fact that the Republican party has been drifting into a semi-ecclesiastical position is contained in the Nation of November 30, under the heading, "The Inconveniences of a Sacerdotal Party": "It is the intense party spirit which exists that makes the situation perilous, and this party spirit has been intensified by what we may call the sacerdotal pretensions of the Republican party. There is no more obnoxious person, when he gets roused and finds himself armed with great powers and responsibilities, than a man profoundly impressed by the depth of his own righteousness; and it may be said also that a political organization which conceives itself to have a sacred or semi-sacred mission, and which wields the power of the State, is an almost alarming phenomenon in times of difficulty. Constitutional government can only be successfully carried on by two purely secular parties, a fact of which the French and Italians have had bitter experience, and which accounts for their intense hostility to what they call 'clericalism' in politics—that is, to any claim of politicians to be guided by superhuman or extra-mundane lights, and on that account to be above the ordinary political criticism and exempt from the operation of arguments drawn from simple expediency. No one can have watched the Republican party very closely during the last five or six years without perceiving the growth of this sacerdotal tendency—that is, a tendency to consider its sacro-sanct character and celestial or semi-celestial origin a substitute for active work in laying claim to continuance in power. The demand which it made about six years ago, when discontent with the Group first began to show itself, that, if it needed reform, it should not on that account be expelled from office, but should be allowed to reform at its own time and in its own way, was really a claim to ecclesiastical origin and functions, because it is only a church which is allowed to reform itself and which can be degraded by abuses without losing its right to popular respect and confidence. We believe no such demand was ever put forward before on behalf of a political organization." There is nothing surprising in this view of the situation, though there is something surprising in the fact that a writer keen-eyed enough to see so far should not also see a little further. The Republicans have claimed to be (and for many years really were) the "party of great moral ideas"; and this moral championship has been for some time degenerating into a religious pretension of dangerous but unnoticed growth. The almost universally conceded assumption (false though it is) that Christianity is the sole source of morality has tended and is tending to convert the "party of great moral ideas" into a "Christian party in politics." Hence the "sacro-sanct character" which the Nation, widely as it differs from THE INDEX, is shrewd enough to discern and point out in its own way; and we quote the above passage as an unintended, but indirect and strikingly apposite confirmation of our own presentment of the case.

FROM RELIGION AND THE REPUBLIC.

Republicanism is well defined as government of the people, by the people, for the people. Its principle is that power shall be entrusted to no one order or class, but to all orders and all classes, not in turn, but simultaneously; that all opinions are equally entitled to expression, all wishes and purposes alike justified in speech. It is not the government of the poor by the rich, of the ill-born by the well-born, of the lowly by the powerful, of the simple by the wise, of the ignorant by the instructed, or even of the bad by the good. It is not the government of any body by any body else, but the administration of the affairs that concern all the people according to the united wishes of all the people concerned. No person having an interest in the commonweal can be disfranchised or treated as a subject without being properly consulted and allowed a fair chance of expressing either approval or disapproval. The wish of the majority at the critical moments of election must be controlling. The quality of the wish is aside from the question. It may be ignorant, passionate, blind, pernicious, mischievous, on all accounts deplorable in the judgment of wise, experienced, and excellent men. No matter; as the wish of the majority it must be respected, and acquiesced in till it can be modified, corrected, or peacefully overborne. Every order of mind is entitled to its voice, and every voice is entitled to a hearing. This, in general, is republicanism.

Now, it cannot be said that one religion, as such, simply and purely as religion, is more congenial with this system than another. The genius of one faith comports with it as well as another's. There is a common impression that Romanism favors monarchical institutions, as being itself monarchical. But this is thoughtlessly alleged. As a dominion, Romanism should naturally prefer the system under which it is most free to make subjects, and is least trammelled in its ambition to acquire power. The history of Romanism in monarchical countries is a history of perpetual struggle with rival dynasties. Its movements were jealously watched; its plans were thwarted; its usurpations met and checked. This is the peculiar danger to which republicanism is exposed from this quarter. There being no dynasty to uphold it, Romanism can, unmolested, lay the foundations for dominion. Hence, perhaps, the hope that leaders in that Church build on America as the land of its adoption and its future home. The association of Romanism with democracy here proves nothing; for the portion of the democracy that it is affiliated with is the most ignorant portion, and the portion most closely allied to the despotic elements,—the slave-owners at the South and their Northern supporters. Were Romanism in sympathy with the educated, responsible, and self-respecting class of the people, its claim to having a preference for republicanism would be better sustained. Its unfortunate alliance with the lowest class of our metropolitan population may, however, be an accident of its history. As a religion, it is difficult to see why Romanism should be unacceptable to Republicans. It is no derogation from one's claim to be a good republican that one reveres the Pope as the vicar of Christ, worships the Virgin, makes intercession through the saints, confesses his sins to a priest, or seeks absolution from the Church. The concerns of his personal spiritual life he may, without cavil, choose to place in the keeping of an ecclesiastical institution rather than hold them in his own hands. That is a matter for the individual alone to judge of. This title to be valued and trusted as a citizen is not vitiated by any such preference. There are, no doubt, excellent republicans who are likewise conscientious Romanists; though, for obvious reasons, the number of them is not so great. The tendency of republican institutions is to encourage freedom of speculation and independence of judgment, both of which lead in the direction of doubt rather than in the direction of faith.

The association of Calvinism with democracy has been remarked upon by Buckle, who explains it on the ground that Calvinism was the religion of the poor, who, as a rule, were the disfranchised and persecuted class. It should be added that Calvinism, although based on the doctrine of human depravity, and, therefore, unsympathetic with democracy, sympathetic rather with theocracy, or monarchy based on the divine right of the king, nevertheless confined the privilege of regeneration to no social or political class, allowed no exclusive rights in the heavenly grace to dynasty or hierarchy, conceded no monopoly of divine favor to culture or dignity, but threw the doors open to all comers, recognized the equal dignity of every human soul, saw the spirit working on all conditions of men, on its own terms, and knew that the chosen of God were as likely to come from the poor and weak as from the opulent and mighty. Calvinism, on principle therefore, is democratic, in spite of its cardinal doctrine. Unregenerate human nature is, of course, incompetent to conduct human affairs according to the rules or towards the ends of justice. But the great are as likely to be unregenerate as the small, the high as the low, the respectable as those of no repute. God alone knew who the regenerate were, and he could be trusted to care for his own.

The only advantage that Free Religion has over Romanism and Protestantism, is that it avoids, in fact makes quite impossible, the perils into which they both run,—Romanism, by pursuing its claim to be the one authoritative Church; Protestantism, by pushing its pretension to have the only inspired book and creed. Christianity, being based on the assumed revelation of Christ, cannot without extreme carefulness, escape the danger of ecclesiasticism on the one hand, and of dogmatism on the other. It is on the brink of this peril all the time. Its most liberal schools do not wholly emancipate themselves from it. The claim to infallibility is subtly insinuated and unconsciously put forth. Free Religion challenges every such claim, by whomsoever made. It will have no infallibilities of priesthood or of creed, of philosophy or of science. It would, once for all, make despotism absurd and impracticable, by removing the special temptation to dictate and domineer. It is our persuasion that republican institutions will not do themselves full justice till this principle shall be recognized.

O. B. F.

EVASIVENESS OF CHRISTIAN RESPONSIBILITY.

In spite of the argument I am going to maintain, I am afraid it must appear to you that a heretic has not a natural sense of responsibility, or otherwise that sense is dormant in your correspondent. So tardy am I with my letters, so protracted is the interval between one and another, that I pray for pardon. I own my fault. I make no excuses. The experience of those who observe confirm the wisdom of the remark of the First Napoleon—the only one of his race who had brains,—that he who is good at excuses is seldom good for anything else.

For some weeks past I have been on the war-path again, through the north of England, and out as far as Glasgow, delivering in one case ten lectures in eight days. One thing which struck me much was the utter feebleness, when ecclesiastical controversialists arose, in their assertions of the efficiency of the Christian scheme of responsibility. A quarter of a century ago they were rampant and accusing, and mere freethought advocacy was overwhelmed by the violence and virulence of the charges they wrought against us, which won for them great applause. Since, however, the ascendancy of secular science has set in, and the material conditions of morality have been made evident, theologians have become reticent or apologetic where once they were eloquent and arrogant. The arguments which I found them no longer impatient to answer were these:—

Christian responsibility is remote, vague, capricious, and inoperative,—else man would be deterred from offence, and crime would not exist. The Christian sins. He is told that hereafter it will be very bad for him. This might deter him if no evasion was open to him. But he is told he may repent, and thus the scoundrel at the eleventh hour is enabled to "dodge" his condemnation. Repentance is but the first prayer for pardon. Enduring contrition, not of the whimpering sort, but marked by solicitous restitution in every way in which it can be done, should be the sole ground of forgiveness. The bad examples of Christ in promising Paradise to the rascal on the cross ruined Christianity as respects responsibility. It is that which has made scoundrelism of so long life. It is that which made Methodists mad in the last century—which has turned the heads of unmelodious ranters in this,—set up convicts as peripatetic saints, and inflicted Moody-and-Sankeyism upon society. Secular responsibility is direct, inevitable, inescapable. No thief on the cross can hope to carry his burglarious soul into any secular Paradise. Secularism teaches that punishment occurs here, and does what it can to take care that it shall follow on unatoned offence. It teaches that life must be changed, that character must alter, that new conduct must be continual and permanent. Prayer and grace may do what they can, but material and social conditions must be created, in which truth shall be possible and honesty pay, and in which, so far as human thought, care, and control can go, it shall be well with the just and well with no one else. Who has forgotten the murder of the poor girl in Great Coram Street, London, for which the Rev. Mr. Hennett, a Dutch minister, was arrested? Who has forgotten the narrative of Dr. Hessel, who, though a clergyman and literally fallen among thieves, under most unmerited indignity and misfortune offered his hand to the delicate-palmed chaplain of the jail, and he refused to take it? There was a Christian clergyman who, refusing a brother clergyman ordinary civilized courtesy in this life, yet who, in case he turned out a real criminal and was convicted of murder and hanged, was quite ready to commend to the personal acceptance of God a man with whom he would not shake hands himself. The poor prostitute, sent to her last account with her throat cut and all her sins on her head, goes below; while the ruffianly murderer, redhanded, is introduced by the chaplain to the white pavement of Heaven. Surely this is an instance of brutal and indecent irresponsibility.

What is the conduct of clergymen in general? Do they not discourse every Sunday to people whose lives they may misdirect, and whose understanding they may impose upon, and offer them no chance of question or reply? The clergyman is not infallible. He is ignorant and erring, like other men; yet he professes to speak in the name of God, and affirms the sanction of heaven to his possible error, and permits no debate on his words. Truth is arrested, lives perverted, false faith inculcated by erroneous words. Those thus injured have no protection in the Church, and they may die before they find out their error. If a minister had any proper sense of responsibility, he would shrink (as from a criminal act) from irresponsible speech; for error solemnly inculcated is the murder of the soul, as every missionary proclaims in countries he goes out to convert; but he never thinks of this at home, because Christians are never taught the responsibility of speech as secularists are.

Let any one regard for a moment the Christian theory of this life. It tells us that all human beings born are immortal, and that God has to provide for them above or below. Yet, in every portion of the land, scoundrelly or vicious parents may bring into existence a squalid brood of dirty, sickly, depraved, ignorant, ragged children. Christianity fails utterly to prevent their existence, and hurls quick words of opprobrium upon any who advocate the prevention of this progeny of crime. Yet the Christian teaches that, by mere act of Orthodox belief, these ignorant and unclean creatures can be sent from the gutter to God. A secularist cannot help shuddering at this doctrine and this practice, so fatal to society, so contemptuous to Heaven. A secularist feels himself responsible for the world; and that, if happily, heaven is the destiny of mankind, he is solicitous that a clean and intelligent population shall go there; his anxiety is that the earth shall be converted into a sensible and moral world. Like Morrell, he labors to bring about that state of things "in which it shall be impossible for men to be depraved or poor"; and he charges himself with a thousand secular duties which the Christian escapes. The Christian can excuse himself with the plea that moral evil is the will of Providence. If he prays against evil he counts himself exonerated, and that he is better and holier than other men. The secularist transfers no responsibility to Providence. He teaches that society is responsible for its own condition. He labors in political movements; he invokes the aid of science; he gives his Sabbath to the service of humanity; and he incurs the ready, the wanton, and the mischievous contempt of many who should have a respectful, if not a generous, word for him.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

MR. MILLS' NEW BOOK.

The Indian Saint; or Buddha and Buddhism. A Sketch Historical and Critical. By Charles D. B. Mills. Northampton, Mass.: Journal and Free Press Co. 1876.

This small volume treats a great subject greatly. Rarely has one ever portrayed the inner life of a faith alien to that in which he was reared so sympathetically and so justly. We almost feel in reading it as if we had been carried back to the days of Gautama, and had heard him expound his own doctrine in all the freshness of its first conception and in all the vital strength of his earnest belief. And yet the sketch is also critical, and gives the limitations and defects of Buddhism as well as its great merits.

Buddhism, as thus expounded, represents a living, active faith, which, like Christianity, has been very much warped from its early simplicity and purity, but which preserves the essential features of the absolute religion, and is specially adapted to peculiar needs and phases of humanity. We wish we could quote or even condense the admirable statements of the Buddhist doctrine of supreme power, which, in its extreme care to avoid the narrowing conceptions of personality and representation of outward form has been often confounded with materialistic atheism. To deny God, or supreme good, and to deny a God, or a specialized representation of that good, are quite different things. Mr. Mills has made this point so interesting and so clear, and his book is so short and so readable, that we cannot do better than advise all interested in the subject to read it for themselves.

The same may be said of his explanation of the much-discussed doctrine of Nirvana. He shows, I think conclusively, that Nirvana is a grand affirmation expressed by negations, and that it is the effort to free the sense of existence alike from all possibility of suffering and from all low forms of enjoyment, which has taken this form; and I confess that I often find delight, after reading the inanities of spiritualist communications and the sentimentalities of sensational rhapsodists, in the cool, calm shades of Nirvana as it images itself in the Buddhist's thought.

Mr. Mills has done a great service to the "sympathy of religions" by this admirable discourse upon one of the three great forms of faith which now divide the progressive world.

AFTER-ELECTION THOUGHTS.

There is no event in our American political life that arouses so universal and intense personal feeling as a popular election,—that tends so effectually to make the individual conscious of the relation which he sustains to the general government and the country, and of the dignity of citizenship. If he has hitherto regarded himself as a mere dweller upon the soil of the Republic, he now comes to a new perception, and feels a keener sense not only of indebtedness for its surpassing advantages and privileges, but also of correspondent obligation. The principle of equality upon which the country professedly is founded, and which, with all the inconsistency of the profession, here prevails more than anywhere, is brought home to his mind with clearer distinctness. He feels that he is invested with a power which constitutes him, whatever else he may be, of importance in the body politic. The distinctions which separate him under other circumstances from those around him disappear at the polls; and, with the ballot in his hand, he stands the peer of the proudest and most powerful in the land.

It is thus that the ballot becomes the educator of the people. The appreciation of the worth of citizenship which it awakens tends to stimulate an effort for a more intelligent discharge of its responsibilities and duties. Herein consists the special superiority of republicanism. It accounts for those brilliant epochs in the march of the human mind that are associated with this form of government, as in Greece, Rome, Italy, Switzerland, and in later times. We are speaking, of course, of the general influence or tendency of such participation,—of what, it must be confessed, may seem an ideal theory rather than manifest in practical effects. It must be acknowledged that there is an immense amount of voting without any intelligent appreciation of its significance and importance or regard for the moral obligation which it imposes. The minds of men are but slowly enlightened or their consciences affected, when partisan or self-interested feelings are suffered to powerfully exercise their sway. We are all familiar with the moral obliquity and the mental incompetency which our popular elections so lamentably reveal. We know how easily, at each recurrence, the votes of vast numbers are bought and sold,—how blindly and servilely the masses follow their party leaders. But, with all due allowance for obvious things like these, we believe that republicanism will be found to favor not only the most general individual freedom, but also the highest type of manhood and character.

Of course a republic has its peculiar difficulties to contend with. It affords the demagogue an opportunity which he does not possess under any other system. It engenders easily sharp party competitions, and through the uncertainty associated with its tenures of trust and power presents peculiar temptations to malfeasance to those who are their temporary incumbents. But these evils are more than counterbalanced by the advantages derived. If a republic affords special facilities and incentives for the exercise of the arts of the demagogue and political trickster, it also supplies conditions not less conducive to the virtues of the patriot, the genuine public leader and statesman. If it stimulates and enlarges the sphere of party competition, it arouses a correspondent intellectual activity and influence upon character. If the uncertainty and brevity of its terms of official station tempt the unprincipled occupant to the conversion of the opportunity to self-advantage, it is also calculated to induce him to aspire to an exemplification of uprightness and fidelity in respect to the trusts committed to him, that shall present unequivocal testimony of his claim to continued confidence and favor.

But whatever may be the issue of republicanism in any particular instance—the result of the difficulties and evils incident to its system which have been indicated,—they do not demonstrate any inherent or necessary invalidity of the system itself. They simply show, in the event of failure, that success, like that of everything else, depends on certain conditions, and that those conditions in this instance, have been wanting. They do not prove that the success of such a system is impossible. If a republic goes to pieces because of its corruption or want of sufficient virtue to hold it together, as has so often been the case, it does not prove that this (unless we believe in the incapacity of human nature for moral and intellectual progress) must always be the inevitable result. There is more reason to believe that republicanism—republicanism even as it exists here in America, with all its short-comings and deficiencies—is the most perfect form of government which the world has ever known, and that towards it more or less visibly sets the whole drift of the present. This was the view of De Tocqueville more than thirty years ago. It was shared by Napoleon,—as is evidenced by his famous prediction that Europe was destined to become Republican or Cossack.

It seems to be inevitable in a country like ours that there should be two great political parties. They are like the centripetal and centrifugal forces in Nature, the one necessary to regulate and balance the other; and the closer their competition the better. There is, nevertheless, always need and room for independent conviction. It is out of such independent conviction that new parties are gradually formed to take the place of the old when they have fallen into desuetude, and can no longer be trusted,—such as that which is forming to-day in this country, growing out of dissatisfaction with those which exist, and sure eventually to succeed them. The great misfortune of our system is that this minority sentiment has no representation in the legislative bodies of the country to make itself more distinctly known and controlling in its influence. Should such a provision ever be effected in our political machinery, the independent voter would be less than now at the mercy of the nominating conventions of the two great parties.

Another improvement, it seems to us, would be the adaptation of something like that which we are informed exists in England,—the practice of printing upon the ticket used at the polls the names, under the respective offices voted for, of all the opposing candidates for each office; so that instead of different tickets a simple one is used for all parties upon which the voter distributes the marks of his preference. This simplifies the process, to say the least; invests the vote with greater privacy, and relieves the polls of much that is objectionable in our practice.

Another defect which the present election imbroglio has brought to light in a striking manner in the operation of our political system, is the obstructive and needless nature of what is known as the Electoral College, in determining the vote for President. So apparent has this become that the time cannot be far distant of its elimination or important modification.

The charges of fraud at the South, humiliating and discreditable as they are, there is reason to believe, will not be without some good results. It is a law of human life that even evil subserves, at times, the cause of good. The first condition for getting rid of evil is for it to come clearly out to view. It has long been a notorious fact in connection with our elections that they involved, now here and now there, now by one party and now by the other, to a less or greater extent, the perpetration of fraud. It is needless to say upon which party these suspicions have most rested. There is abundant evidence that they have been countenanced and practised, even here at the North, by both. The present juncture of affairs will concentrate attention upon this great and disastrous evil as never before. It will impart an increased sense of the importance of the purity of the ballot and lead to new safeguards for its protection. And there is nothing in respect to which there is greater need of education. We need with this a more exalted standard of statesmanship, a profounder acquaintance among our public men with the true principles of government, a better-trained ability to deal with the complications and great concerns of national affairs, the substitution of character for political charlatanism and cunning. We need a higher standard of honor and truthfulness among our newspapers and those at the head of them, so that they may be something more than organs of misrepresentation, partisanship, and vilification, and serve to aid the public mind to clearer views and correcter opinions rather than to mystify and bewilder. But we need above all, and first of all, as the one great essential to the perpetuity of a republic, a more thorough and wider diffused intellectual enlightenment and moral education among our people,—the only genuine panacea for the ills under which we suffer.

Let there be but one voice in the land to-day, a true and honest count of the votes in the disputed States. Let justice be done, though the heavens fall,—whoever shall be President. Then shall the nation emerge from out this ordeal in more radiant virtue, and stand forth "unashamed, with spotless robe and clean white hands."

CURRENT EVENTS.

BY R. C.

The peculiar political performance in South Carolina, of which we wrote last week, rapidly degenerated and became a miserable farce which, it is to be hoped, may come to some kind of a conclusion before the close of the present week. The recalcitrant canvassers were got out of jail upon a writ of habeas corpus from the United States Court, and it is quite possible that, as canvassers, nothing more will be heard of them. The Legislature attempted to assemble, but the Democratic Representatives, who marched to their hall with the rejected delegates from Laurens and Edgefield counties at their head, were met at the door by United States troops who refused them admission. This unconstitutional interference with a State legislature caused considerable excitement throughout the country, and Democratic papers began to talk about the impeachment of President Grant. The President, however, disavowed any connection with this action of the soldiers, and General Ruger, who commanded the troops, subsequently stated that his men exceeded their orders. In the mean time, the Republican members organized in the State House, and the Democratic members, who had withdrawn in a body, did the same thing somewhere else. Next day found the two rival factions gathered at the State House, and as the one would not recognize the validity of the organization of the other, both proceeded to business, the two Speakers entertaining motions and listening to speeches at the same time. As night approached this parody upon legislation was enlivened by the yells of drunken negroes and the sputtering of tallow candles stuck in glass bottles; but every one present, we are assured, remained good-humored, and, we trust, has managed to retain the same blissful attitude ever since, for, as we write, the pitiable performance has been kept up for several days, each faction being afraid to adjourn and no compromise having yet been effected. It is reported, however, that several Republican members have gone over to the Democratic side. If this report be correct, the Republicans are left without a quorum, and if they should now be sustained, as report declares that Chandler and Cameron desire, by United States troops, some of the beauties of a constitutional and republican government will receive a new illustration.

Some of the stories of diabolical outrages perpetrated upon negroes for purposes of political intimidation, which have come to us from Louisiana during the past week, have been enough to make a reader's blood run cold; but by the time his teeth began to chatter he would discover that abundant evidence had been produced to prove that the stories were wholly mythical, or that the deeds of lawlessness described had no connection whatever with politics, and then his blood would warm up again with righteous indignation against the liars who had deceived him. That there has been a certain amount of political intimidation in Louisiana and other Southern States, we suppose no one doubts; but that it has been carried on to the extent declared, or had the effect ascribed to it by political leaders, we suppose no one believes. Kellogg and his associates have been in possession of the government of Louisiana, with all the State and United States forces at their command, for several years, and, were not their political necks in jeopardy, would be among the first to deny the possibility of the occurrence of such wholesale lawlessness in their State. Aside from the testimony of affidavits (which can be furnished in unlimited quantity upon both sides of every matter at issue in Louisiana), the change which has taken place in the vote of that State is by no means remarkable and needs no "bulldozing" in order to account for it. New York State exhibits more remarkable changes at almost every election, and this year's vote of staid Massachusetts—which has nowhere been "bulldozed," unless we except Butler's district, the count of which, however, no one proposes to reject—compared with that of last year or with that of four years ago, shows changes as great as any in fickle Louisiana.

The Committee of Visiting Democrats which has been present during the counting of votes by the Returning Board at New Orleans has issued an address "to the people of the United States" declaring that the result of the vote for Presidential electors in Louisiana—as shown by "a certified copy of the duplicate statements of votes made by the Commissioners of Election at each place of voting in the State," and also "as disclosed on the face of the returns opened by the Returning Board in our presence"—proves that the Tilden electors have majorities ranging from five thousand to eight thousand (the exact figures are given in the address). "Irregularities," the address states, "have been committed in some instances by the officers conducting the elections and in making returns, but they are about as much on one side as the other; and as to intimidation and violence or other illegal act preventing a free and fair election, there is evidence on both sides, but not of such character as to affect the general result."

The session of Congress which begins this week, with Mr. Randall as Speaker in place of Mr. Kerr, should be given properly to the consideration of matters of grave importance belonging to general legislation. The tariff; the reorganization of the Federal Judiciary; the further distribution of the Geneva award; the non-sectarian amendment to the Constitution; the abolition of compulsory pilotage; reciprocity with Canada; the resumption of specie payments,—these are some of the questions which require immediate consideration, as well as the usual appropriation bills; but it seems quite probable at present that the time which should be given to these will be consumed by a deplorable wrangle over the result of the election.

There is one way, however, in which a contested election may be avoided, even if the "doubtful" States should throw their votes for Hayes. This is—as stated at length in a well-argued article by the Nation—to have one, at least, of the electors cast his vote, not for Tilden and Hendricks, or Hayes and Wheeler, but for a third combination of names, say, for instance, for Bristow and Jewell. This, of course, would leave all the regular candidates without a majority, and as, according to the Constitution, the election would then be referred to Congress, the House would elect Tilden for President and the Senate would elect Wheeler for Vice-President,—a compromise which many of the leaders of both parties would gladly accept as the only salvation from the unknown and dreaded evils of a contested election. Of course the elector who should so vote might expect to be denounced by party papers as a political traitor, but he might nevertheless, according to the Nation, "safely count on the support of a vast number of the most thinking and influential members of either party." The argument would not hold good for a moment, of course, if it were possible for the electors to give us either Tilden or Hayes without dispute; but this in all probability they will not be able to do. The question is, therefore, would not an elector be justified and even more than justified in regarding the issue to-day as wholly changed, and his former duty to his party as entirely subservient to a higher duty to his country? On the other hand Mr. William Lloyd Garrison declares that an elector who should act in accordance with the above suggestion would be "weak in understanding," "corrupt in heart," and "trucking in spirit." As the Electoral College will have met and voted before this is read, it may not be necessary to decide the above question, and we shall only promise, therefore, that if the issue be really presented we shall not fail to express a decided opinion.

In connection with the discussion of pending political affairs we desire to commend most heartily a sermon by Mr. James Freeman Clarke, delivered in Boston on Thanksgiving day, and since fully reported in several newspapers. As a practical politician Mr. Clarke seldom fails to utter with great vigor and plainness the right word at the right moment. It was he who, upon a memorable occasion, at a Massachusetts State Convention, proclaimed the duty of bolting a possible party nomination, at a time when leading politicians like the Hoar brothers sat silent, apparently cowed by the demagogue, Butler; and upon other occasions he has displayed an equally courageous independence as well as clearness of perception. We commend Mr. Clarke's political utterances with all the more pleasure, inasmuch as we seldom find ourselves in agreement with him upon matters of theology.

Mr. C. C. Carpenter, a Boston clergyman, delivered recently a sermon upon almsgiving, in which he took the only position possible to a student of social matters, and plainly set forth the mischievous results of that form of charity which is annually illustrated on a large scale by many city governments in voting free-soups to the poor,—well described by a newspaper as "an advertisement for tramps." Mr. Carpenter illustrated his sermon by practical instances from his own experience, instances paralleled doubtless in the experience of almost every person of any prominence in our large cities, and stated, among other good things, the following rule: "If the applicant for charity at your door is unknown to you and brings no satisfactory credentials, his appeal for money, food, clothing, or anything which he can carry away, even to a crust of bread, should be denied him."

Mr. Carpenter has been severely criticised by "Archibald Scate," who writes some very silly sentences, and who misconceives and misrepresents some of Mr. Carpenter's statements and arguments. But he succeeds, nevertheless, in proving very clearly, in our opinion, that Mr. Carpenter's main position is entirely inconsistent with that of Jesus, as stated especially in the Sermon on the Mount. Mr. Scate quotes the well-known sentence, "Give to him that asketh, and from him that would borrow turn not away"; also the passages upon which are pronounced the famous judgment in the twenty-fifth chapter of Matthew, and some others of like intent, and shows how directly their teachings are opposed to the teachings of Mr. Carpenter. We have no doubt whatever that the essential principles of Mr. Carpenter's sermon would be assented to by every well-informed student of social science on the face of the earth, and just as little do we doubt that Mr. Scate has shown them to be inconsistent with positive precepts of the New Testament. The authority of the astronomical, geological, and some historical portions of the Bible was long since rejected by eminent Orthodox clergymen, and we should like to ask some of the most candid among them if any good reason now exists for the retention of the authority of certain moral precepts which, however well they may have been adapted to the semi-barbarous society which first received them, can not be applied either literally or in spirit to the civilization of to-day.

Mr. Charles Dudley Warner has published, in the Christian Union, an article on church-taxation, in which he admits the existence of three strong reasons which favor the exemption of church property from taxation. These are (1) that churches help to preserve order and morality; (2) that church buildings are often ornamental and increase the value of surrounding property; and (3) that church property is unproductive. In our opinion the above reasons are exceedingly weak, and we do not wonder that Mr. Warner regards them as inferior to many reasons which can be given in favor of church-taxation. The strongest of these, in his opinion, are (1) that exemption of churches adds to the taxes of those who do not attend church, and is therefore unjust; (2) that people content to worship in unpretentious buildings are indirectly taxed to support the more costly edifices of their neighbors; (3) that churches would be vigorous and useful in proportion to their independence; (4) that exemption needlessly multiplies church buildings; and (5) that there is great danger (which he illustrates in many ways) in the accumulation of property in ecclesiastical hands,—a danger very much increased by exemption from taxation.

A PROPHETIC COOK.

The Rev. Joseph Cook is in the habit of favoring his audiences with a series of comments upon the events of the week, as a kind of preface to his regular weekly lectures. What connection these rambling remarks have with the advertised subject for the day it would be difficult to determine. However, it is in this farce which precedes the tragedy that the egotism of Mr. Cook frequently appears most conspicuously. On Monday, Nov. 20, Mr. Cook noticed in somewhat contemptuous terms the conference lately held in this city under the auspices of the Free Religious Association. As he had been respectfully invited to appear at this conference and to state his views upon the Sunday question, in a spirit of candid inquiry after truth, it was, to say the least, in very poor taste for Mr. Cook to speak thus of a convention which had offered to him its platform. His want of manners may, however, be irremediable at his time of life, and we can only sigh that so great a genius should be at the same time so ill-bred. But it is to the prophetic soul of Mr. Cook that we desire to call especial attention.

Inflamed with the spirit of Ezekiel or Nahum, the reverend lecturer recently exclaimed, "Give America, from sea to sea, the Parisian Sunday, and in two hundred years all our greatest cities will be politically under the heels of the featherheads, the rascals, the sneaks and the money-grapes! Abolish Sunday and the social sanity it fosters, and in less than a century the conflict between labor and capital would issue in petroleum fire-bottles!" It would be interesting to many persons to know from what source this reverend seer obtained his insight into the future.

Mr. Cook declares that he "reverses the scientific method." Of course, then, he would not utter such extraordinary statements as those just cited without strong proofs of their correctness. But we are puzzled to know by what scientific method the reverend prophet has been able thus to pierce "the dim vista of the future," and that, too, to a distance of two hundred years! Say, modest seer (who assumest in respect to Hermann Lotze the position of Gratz Brown's tag in Nast's pictures of Greeley), dost thou speak thus as from the Lord, or hath Gabriel communicated it to thy prophetic soul? If thou hast had in truth a revelation vouchsafed to thee, oh, stop not here! Pray tell us more! Declare to us the concessions which the evolutionists of those days will make!

We should be much gratified if the supernatural Powers, which seem thus to have spoken through the mouth of Mr. Cook, would shorten the time of this experiment to a period of twenty or thirty years, so that the present generation might judge of the truth of this statement in case the Parisian Sunday should be introduced. Not that we have the slightest doubt of the veracity of the supernatural Powers, but because, to confess the truth, we do not put much confidence in the judgment of Mr. Cook. If, however, the reverend seer should tell us that the period of two hundred years cannot be shortened, because an irrevocable law has been established to this effect by the Powers above mentioned which requires just that amount of time, we would still be glad to have those Divine agents in some way testify that what Mr. Cook says is given under their dictation. The reason of our asking this is obvious. It is for the benefit of mankind. We all know how the Government of France dreads the recurrence of the horrors of the Commune, and how eagerly it would embrace any sure preventive of such deeds of violence. If, then, it can be shown that the Parisian Sunday is the cause of all the trouble, and that according to an inevitable law two centuries of such Sundays are sufficient to produce this horrible result, it will only remain to remove the cause of so much evil, which of course the French Government will be glad to do. All other nations will at once take warning and follow its example. Even the great empire of Germany, the land of Hermann Lotze, will doubtless alter its long-established custom of making Sunday largely a day of amusement, and the great name of COOK will be revered from Lisbon to St. Petersburg, and from Berlin to Naples! Unfortunately this name may be confounded with that of the other distinguished Cook who has made himself so famous in Europe as a Tourist Manager, and people may begin to suspect some American hoax in the new reform.

But if the illustrious Hermann Lotze will but rise to explain that the great Sunday Reformer, the American Seer, the Demolisher of Spencer and Huxley, is not the tourist but the Boston lecturer, who is praying at the street-corners for a professorship at Andover Seminary, all will be well, and public confidence will be restored.

The people of Boston are invited week after week to hear a man who is not a scientist attempt to decide between the defenders of two conflicting, and as yet unsettled, scientific hypotheses. He, as well as the rest of us who have not spent years of scientific study upon the subject, should calmly await the issue of the controversy, knowing that truth will prevail. Instead of that, we have weekly the sad spectacle of this man haranguing an assembly of frightened Orthodox people upon subjects which he has not scientifically investigated. But that is not all. We see this self-satisfied lecturer, who tells us at every breath where he has been and at what great man's elbow he has danced attendance, uttering such sophomoric rant as his "two hundred years" prophecies, and coining such words as "money-grapes" and "petroleum fire-bottles," to startle his amazed admirers into "great applause"! And still worse, we see him, while pretending to discuss a scientific subject, bring forward as an argument the words imputed to poor old Carlyle in reference to the ancestors of Darwin being "atheists," and actually close his lecture by adjuring the colleges and ministers of New England to give ear to these words uttered on the brink of the grave! For shame! What have the religious beliefs or disbeliefs of a man's family to do with the truth or error of a scientific question? For shame! Why did not this clerical Boston lecturer inform his audience bravely and honorably, that Mr. Darwin himself is no atheist, but that, on the contrary, he inclines to the belief that the primordial forms were created by a personal God? Mr. Cook knew this, but he knew also that by thus dealing with his subject and by closing with a bombastic flourish he would win the applause of his popular audience. Yet this is the man who is lecturing on the deepest of all scientific questions, and who "reverses the scientific method!"

"GREAT APPLAUSE."

REV. J. COOK ON THE SABBATH.

Safe popular freedom consists of four things, and cannot be safely compounded out of any three of the four,—the diffusion of liberty, the diffusion of intelligence, the diffusion of property, and the diffusion of conscientiousness. In the latter work the Church is the chief agent, and her most important instrumentality we call the Sabbath. Goldwin Smith very subtly says that it is free religion and hallowed Sundays which explain the average moral prosperity of America. We have had in the last week in Boston a somewhat obscure and erratic convention, advising America to do better than she has thus far done in following the New England ideas concerning Sunday. Give America, from sea to sea, the Parisian Sunday, and in two hundred years all our greatest cities will be politically under the heels of the featherheads, the rascals, the sneaks, and the money-grapes. [Applause.] Abolish Sunday and the social sanity it fosters, and in less than a century, the conflict between labor and capital would issue here in petroleum fire-bottles. Capital in our great municipalities is fleeced now to the skin. Does it wish such social insanity to spring up as shall cut it through the cellular integument to the quick? If it does, let capital abolish Sunday. Working-men desire to build co-operation up into a palace for themselves and their little ones,—and God speed their effort to protect their own! But how can co-operation succeed without the large confidence of man in man; and how can that come without the moral culture given by the right use of Sundays? Co-operation fails because men are not honest. How are men to be made honest without a time set apart for religious culture? That population which habitually neglects the pulpit or its equivalent one day in seven, can ultimately be led by charlatans, and will be. [Much applause.]

I am no fanatic, I hope, as to Sunday; but I look abroad over the map of popular freedom in the world, and it does not seem to me accidental that Switzerland, Scotland, England, and the United States, the countries which best observe Sunday, constitute almost the entire map of safe popular government.

Sabbath is a day of religious culture and cheerful rest. Its Biblical warrant is found in the reaffirmation by the Sermon on the Mount of the whole moral spirit of the Decalogue. I affirm, without fear of successful contradiction by any cultured thought, that the Sermon on the Mount reaffirms the moral spirit of the Decalogue, and in that reaffirmation perpetuates the direction to hallow one-seventh portion of our time,—it matters very little which seventh. "Forasmuch as ye assemble yourselves together" is apostolic precept, as it was apostolic example. No doubt small critics may show that the apostles and our Lord did works of necessity and mercy on the Sabbath; and so do we, and so will we to the end of time. But the Sermon on the Mount reaffirms your first, your second, your third, your fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth commandments. How are you to show that it does not reaffirm the fourth in spirit? "Not one jot or tittle shall ever pass from the law till all be fulfilled."

It is fifteen hundred years now since Constantine put into execution the law bringing one day in seven an unwonted hush on all industry in the Roman dominion. Here we are ten centuries off from the time when Christianity closed her chief political struggles. Here is a republic built chiefly by Christianity, and perfectly free, and governing more square miles than ever Caesar ruled over. This nation calls peace to her industries one day in seven. She sends nine million of her population, one in five, to a world's fair, and shuts the door every Sunday. I know what report says about the evasions and hypocrisy of the Centennial Commission in admitting persons surreptitiously into the buildings on the Sabbath, against the vote to close the grounds on that day. If these reports are correct, the Centennial Commission ought to have public rebuke unless it can make adequate explanation.

I am glad to see that even this erratic convention, dazzled out of sight by the sound ideas and majestic words of the Episcopal Congress [applause], was wise enough to say that it did not wish to introduce into America the European Sunday.

Hallam says that European despotic rulers have cultivated, as Charles II. did in the day of the Book of Sports, a love of pastime on Sabbaths in order that their people might be more quiet under political distresses. "A holiday Sabbath is the ally of despotism." Wherever the Romish or Parisian Sunday has prevailed for generations, it has made the whole lives of peasant populations a prolonged childhood.

America, I venture to say, is satisfied with the record of the Sabbaths in her World's Exhibition. This convention seemed to think, however, that the burden of a great reform was laid upon its shoulders. It apparently thought its thin meetings the representation of a large constituency. Men are strangely full of company sometimes, when before the mirrors of high self-appreciation. Sydney Smith, calling on a nobleman, passed through a room full of mirrors, which showed him several images of his own form approaching from many directions. He was wholly alone, but he was overheard to say: "A meeting of the clergy, I see!" [Great laughter and applause.]—Boston Advertiser, Nov. 21.

THE BIBLE AGAINST WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

In your Glimpses, in THE INDEX of Nov. 9, you publish an extract from a letter of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, in which she says: "Woman is held in bondage to-day by the complete perversion of the religious element of her being. I have long seen this, and tried to do the best I could by liberal interpretations of the Bible; but that, I find, amounts to very little so long as the priest, with holy unction, teaches the opposite." Now I want to protest against this "liberal interpretation of the Bible," and I want to submit my opinion that no interpretation of the Bible, however liberal it may be, which leaves it still the word of God, will ever accomplish the object for which she (Mrs. Stanton) is working. While we accept the Bible as of divine authority, every one will interpret it for himself, or accept the interpretation of the priest (which from the Bible standpoint is the most logical, and has the most unequivocal scriptural texts to back it up) instead of Mrs. Stanton's. The Bible certainly teaches woman's subjection to man in clearer terms than any liberal interpretation can teach the opposite. In fact, even with the most liberal interpretation of the Bible, I am at a loss to understand how the reverse of the above proposition can be maintained.

The only way, in my opinion, to free woman from this bondage, is to convince her that the Bible is not the inspired word of God, and thereby liberate her from this thralldom and from her slavish submission to priestly authority. This acceptance of the Bible as the word of God (for it does not amount to an intelligent belief, with the vast majority of Christians) is the key to the position; and, as long as it cannot be successfully assailed, the enemy will hold the fort. The position cannot be flanked successfully by any mere interpretation, let it be ever so liberal. It is true that some of the outposts may be carried, and a few individuals, comparatively speaking, from an innate sense of justice, may come out and advocate the cause of woman's rights and try to reconcile it with the teachings of the Bible. But the masses will solidly follow the dictum of the priest. While admiring Mrs. Stanton's heroism and ability in advocating the cause of woman's rights, I cannot see how she can do so consistently with Bible teachings.

As a specimen of what the Bible teaches on this subject, let me cite you to I. Timothy, 2d chapter, from the 9th to the 15th verse, inclusive. If Paul be inspired to write this, I do not see how Mrs. Stanton can advocate woman's rights. She should "learn in silence with all subjection." But to show how inconsistent this passage is with our idea of justice, and that therefore God could not have inspired the writer of it, let me submit my views on the following passage (verse 14) of the above chapter:—

"And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression." Eve was pure and innocent. She had no conception of a falsehood, no idea of death, the penalty for her disobedience, and was without a knowledge of good and evil. Is it any wonder that, being exposed to be tempted by the serpent skilled in all the arts of deception, she should be deceived; and, being deceived, should disobey God's command and eat of the forbidden fruit? How could a just God condemn and punish her for it? How would we treat an innocent child in like circumstances; would not the very fact that the child was innocent and guileless, and had been deceived thereby, be an abundant justification (or at least an excuse) for its having disobeyed our command? But we find that, although Eve was deceived and Adam was not, Eve was condemned to live in subjection to Adam (who was the most deserving of punishment, because he had wilfully disobeyed God's command), and cursed with the pains of child-bearing. By the way, the pains of childbirth are not confined to women, but are common to all animals. Query: Did they also eat of the forbidden fruit? Since the Biblical history of Adam's fall is utterly inconsistent with our ideas of justice, it logically follows that God could not have inspired any one to write it. Mrs. Stanton may look at this question from a different standpoint; but, if I were a believer in the inspiration of the Bible, I certainly would be opposed to woman's rights. MORS.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns. No cuts will be admitted.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

For 1 to 12 insertions, 10c per line.
" 13 " 25 "	8 " "
" 26 " 51 "	6 " "
" 52 " "	5 " "

On half-column advertisements, a discount of 10 per cent. will be made; on full-column advertisements, a discount of 25 per cent.

On all advertisements for which cash is paid in advance, a further discount of 25 per cent. on the total, as above calculated, will be made. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 30, 1873.

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEPHENS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

OFFICE, No. 231 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON,
has been organized with a capital stock fixed at ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.

WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Sparta, Wis.

Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.

Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tena-

sy, N.Y.
Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and at the same rate for shorter periods. All remittances of money must be at the sender's risk, unless forwarded by cheque, registered letter, or post-office money order. THE SECULAR REVIEW.

A JOURNAL OF DAILY LIFE.

Edited by GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

The Secular Review is a new Journal of new subjects; and of familiar subjects treated in a fresh way. It will seek to recast old forms of propaganda which now exhaust earnestness without producing the fruit of advancement. In Education, it will show that Secular principle implies separateness of instruction, and not conflict with religious conviction. In Cooperation, that new force of industry which attains competency without mendacity, and effaces inequality by equalizing fortunes (which has now no organ in London), The Secular Review will advocate the re-institution of Labor Exchanges—killed by their success forty years ago, and more than ever useful now to thousands to whom other forms of Cooperation are unknown, irksome, or inapplicable. In Politics, The Secular Review will contend for Radical ascendancy on the open plain of principle, and not dodge for progress by capricious or spite-borne alliances with its enemies. In Religion, Secularism substitutes the piety of usefulness for the barren doctrine of the usefulness of piety—maintaining always that there is not, and never was, any real antagonism between the sincerity of Free Thought and the only permanent form of religion—the Religion of Duty. The auxiliary, not the rival, of any similar Journal, The Secular Review will be a fighting paper, attacking error, without assailing personally those who hold it, not discerning it to be such. It will regard the adversary, not as an enemy, but as a friend, aiding in the search after truth. Afraid of no topic, The Secular Review will see in the boldest speculation but the hand of Intellect, adventurously feeling for Reality in the dark. This Journal will mainly represent Constructive Free Thought, helping to convert the fifty-two Sundays of the year into the Wise Days, instead of as now, the Dead Days, of the working people; and in all things give primary attention to the material improvement of this Life. For readers, The Secular Review will look among those men and women who know how to be daring without being irreverent, fearless without being careless, and unconventional without being foolish.

Price of subscription—to America, post-free, $2.25 a year, in advance. Address, E. TRULOVE, 258 High Holborn, London W.C., England.

SEND ONE DOLLAR

For a handsome Certificate of Membership as an

ANNUAL MEMBER

—OF THE—

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

With its beautiful gilt-embossed SEAL—representing Columbia holding the scales of Justice above the eager clutch of the Catholic Bishop and the Protestant Clergyman, together with the Capitol and the Meeting-house at opposite corners, symbolizing the Separation of Church and State.

For TWENTY-FIVE DOLLARS, a still larger Certificate of Membership as a

LIFE MEMBER,

With the same Seal attached, will be sent to any person; and individuals cannot render more efficient assistance to the National Liberal League than by making themselves Life Members of it.

These Certificates, if framed and hung upon the wall, will make a very

ATTRACTIVE ORNAMENT

in any apartment.

The following extracts from the Constitution of the National Liberal League explain the privileges of membership:—

ARTICLE IV.—Any person who shall pay one dollar into the treasury shall be entitled to a certificate, signed by the President and Secretary, as an annual member of the National Liberal League. Any person who shall pay twenty-five dollars or more into the treasury shall be entitled to a similar certificate as a life-member. All the persons present as members at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, at which this Constitution was adopted, are hereby declared permanent or charter-members of the National Liberal League.

ARTICLE V.—... All charter-members and life-members of the National Liberal League, and all duly accredited delegates from local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution, shall be entitled to seats and votes in the Annual Congress. Annual members of the National Liberal League shall be entitled to seats, but not to votes, in the Annual Congress.

Address NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington Street, Boston.

ORGANIZE!

CHARTERS

for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, conferring the privilege of representation by five delegates in the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, are now ready for delivery, and will be promptly sent on application, according to the following provisions of Constitution of the same:—

LOCAL AUXILIARY LIBERAL LEAGUES.

ARTICLE XIII.—The Board of Directors shall have authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Liberal League.

ARTICLE XV.—Local auxiliary Liberal Leagues organized under charters issued by the Board of Directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient cooperation of the freest kind with the National Liberal League and with other local Leagues. All votes of the Annual Congress, and all communications of the Board of Directors, shall possess no more authority or influence over them than lies in the intrinsic wisdom of the words themselves.

ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress.

These Charters are beautifully printed on the best of paper. Adorned with the handsome gilt-embossed Seal of the National Liberal League, on a scarlet ground, they will, if tastefully framed, make a fine ornament for any hall.

VOLUME 7.

BOSTON, MASS., THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1876.

WHOLE No. 864.

THE THIRTEEN PRINCIPLES.

PLATFORM OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM THE "PATRIOTIC ADDRESS."

1. The Constitution of the United States is built on the principle that the State can be, and ought to be, totally independent of the Church: in other words, that the natural reason and conscience of mankind are a sufficient guarantee of a happy, well-ordered, and virtuous civil community, and that free popular government must prove a failure, if the Church is suffered to control legislation.

2. The religious rights and liberties of all citizens without exception, under the Constitution, are absolutely equal.

3. These equal religious rights and liberties include the right of every citizen to enjoy, on the one hand, the unrestricted exercise of his own religious opinions, so long as they lead him to no infringement of the equal rights of others; and not to be compelled, on the other hand, by taxation or otherwise, to support any religious opinions which are not his own.

4. These equal religious rights and liberties do not depend in the slightest degree upon conformity to the opinions of the majority, but are possessed to their fullest extent by those who differ from the majority fundamentally and totally.

5. Christians possess under the Constitution no religious rights or liberties which are not equally shared by Jews, Buddhists, Confucians, Spiritualists, materialists, rationalists, freethinkers, sceptics, infidels, atheists, pantheists, and all other classes of citizens who disbelieve in the Christian religion.

6. Public or national morality requires all laws and acts of the government to be in strict accordance with this absolute equality of all citizens with respect to religious rights and liberties.

7. Any infringement by the government of this absolute equality of religious rights and liberties is an act of national immorality, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, the government was founded to "establish."

8. Those who labor to make the laws protect more faithfully the equal religious rights and liberties of all the citizens are not the "enemies of morality," but moral reformers in the true sense of the word, and act in the evident interest of public righteousness and peace.

9. Those who labor to gain or to retain for one class of religious believers any legal privilege, advantage, or immunity which is not equally enjoyed by the community at large are really "enemies of morality," unite Church and State in proportion to their success, and, no matter how ignorantly or innocently, are doing their utmost to destroy the Constitution and undermine this free government.

10. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal religious rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of the truth respecting religion; while violation of these rights, by checking the free movement of mind, postpones the triumph of truth over error, and of right over wrong.

11. No religion can be true whose continued existence depends on continued State aid. If the Church has the truth, it does not need the unjust favoritism of the State; if it has not the truth, the iniquity of such favoritism is magnified tenfold.

12. No religion can be favorable to morality whose continued existence depends on continued injustice. If the Church teaches good morals, of which justice is a fundamental law, it will gain in public respect by practising the morals it teaches, and voluntarily offering to forego its unjust legal advantages; if it does not teach good morals, then the claim to these unjust advantages on the score of its good moral influence becomes as wicked as it is weak.

13. Whether true or false, whether a fountain of good moral influences or of bad, no particular religion and no particular church has the least claim in justice upon the State for any favor, any privilege, any immunity. The Constitution is no respecter of persons and no respecter of churches; its sole office is to establish civil society on the principles of right reason and impartial justice; and any State aid rendered to the Church, being a compulsion of the whole people to support the Church, wrongs every citizen who protests against such compulsion, violates impartial justice, sets at naught the first principles of morality, and subverts the Constitution by undermining the fundamental idea on which it is built.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT:

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

GLIMPSES.

PROFESSOR C. A. YOUNG, in a lecture at New York on December 1, stated the distance of the sun from the earth, as determined by the latest and best measurement, to be 92,500,000 miles.

MR. EVARTS dryly suggests that the best way to stop the political fuss is to "put the Presidency into the hands of a receiver, with power to run the concern and collect the debts." Might there not be a worse fuss over the receivership?

SAID CARLYLE to Professor Huxley not long since: "You Darwinians are spending your lives in trying to prove that men are descended from apes; and it needs more than our civilization to prevent them from being ogres." We wonder whether Professor Huxley good-humoredly retorted: "You have been spending your life trying to prove that the people of England are 'thirty millions, mostly fools'; and it will take Darwinism to prevent your lugubrious gospel from being true."

A WASHINGTON dispatch in the Tribune of December 6 shows how dear to the Congressional soul is the vicarious piety of its chaplain: "It is a curious fact that, while special prayer-meetings for the benefit of Congress were held in New York and Philadelphia yesterday, one branch of Congress forgot to pray for itself. In the House the chaplain was on hand to open the session with the customary invocation, but he was forgotten in the eagerness of the Democrats to exclude Colorado from representation."

PRESIDENT GRANT's eighth and last Annual Message, by its manly and almost pathetic opening words, must surely satisfy all but malignant partisans of the honesty and conscientiousness of his purposes in administering his great office. Now that the frantic talk of "Caesarism" and the "third term" is all over, there will be a very different permanent judgment of his character from that based on the passions of an hour. That President Grant has been mainly actuated by patriotism and a sense of public duty in his eight years of power, we are less than ever inclined to doubt; and, despite his honestly confessed mistakes, the American people will not be ungrateful in the end to one whose services to them cannot be measured by words.

THE LONDON Daily News of November 16 editorially draws attention to the fact that Cardinal Simeoni, the successor of Cardinal Antonelli, who was elevated to the dignity of a Prince of the Church on the occasion of his appointment as Papal Nuncio to the King of Spain, signalled his arrival in that country by issuing a protest against the law of religious liberty, which the revolution had established in Spain, and demanded the restoration of the Concordat of 1851, whose fundamental principle required "the exclusion of every other creed." He was especially apprehensive of the results of a system of education which was not absolutely under priestly control. Simeoni's circular was so violent that the liberal journals at the time advised that his passport should be given him at once, and a mob burned the obnoxious Concordat of 1851 before his residence in Madrid.

THE SECRETARY of the Interior, in his report to Congress, holds it to be the true Indian policy to teach the Indian to support himself, instead of being supported by the nation. "But the logic of self-support," says the Tribune, "points unerringly to the rights of citizenship. If we can train an Indian to feed and clothe himself, we can educate him to be a useful citizen. The Secretary recognizes this, for he declares, without reservation, that the tribal system must be abolished." It is this tribal system which makes the Indians political aliens in the country they inhabit, deprives them of the protection of the laws accorded to citizens, and seems to stand most in the way of their civilization. In Canada, as we are informed, the Indian "has not been regarded as a member of an independent tribe, but as one of her Majesty's Indian subjects"; and "the success which the Canadians have achieved in dealing with the Indians and converting them into peaceable citizens, throws light upon our own failures and blunders"—and crimes. Instead of trying, under the guidance of the sects, to "Christianize" the Indians, the government ought to aim exclusively at civilizing them; and, be it remembered, to civilize is neither more nor less than to citizenize.

AS IF to demonstrate the timeliness of the Sunday Observance Convention, the disgraceful state of existing Sunday laws, and the practical necessity of the Liberal League movement right here in Boston, a case has just been brought before the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, on appeal from the Superior Court, which shows how tyrannically this professedly enlightened community still tramples on the rights of conscience. Mr. Gehring Has, of Roxbury, was convicted last September of keeping his shop open on Sunday for the sale of candy, ice-cream, etc., although (being apparently a Jew) he pleaded that he "conscientiously believed that the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as the Sabbath, that he so observed it, and that he disturbed no one." What his sentence was, we are not informed; but he appealed to the Supreme Court, and the case is at present writing still undecided. We affirm with energy that it is a disgrace to Boston, to Massachusetts, to the United States, and above all to the non-Orthodox part of the population, that the Liberal League is not supplied with abundant funds, and backed by overwhelming public support, for the repeal of the laws which thus enact oppression and yet arouse no indignant, swift, and effective protest. We have no wish to wound any one's feelings, or to be unreasonable, capricious, or querulous; but, when the radicals of this State and city, where they are stronger than perhaps in any other part of the country, content themselves with mere Sunday services, club discussions, and parlor entertainments, turn a cold shoulder to the one earnest public movement which would right these wrongs, and leave the Liberal League powerless for lack of means and friends, they go far to justify the contemptuous sneers of the Orthodox at the moral feebleness of radicalism, and fill at least one soul with shame and mortification at their spiritlessness, apathy, and seeming selfishness. And, much as we should like to please, we cannot be careful whom we may offend in this cause.
